Locked Up: Demore, Mandatory Detention, and the Fifth Amendment

Alix Sirota
Washington and Lee University School of Law

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarlycommons.law.wlu.edu/wlulr

Part of the Law Commons

Recommended Citation
Locked Up: Demore, Mandatory Detention, and the Fifth Amendment

Alix Sirota*

Table of Contents

I. Introduction ................................................................. 2338

II. Examining 8 U.S.C. § 1226(c) ........................................ 2346
  A. Background and Impact of § 1226(c) ...................... 2346
  B. Legislative History of § 1226(c) ......................... 2348

III. Chinese Exclusion Cases and the Origin of the Plenary Power Doctrine .................................. 2349
  A. Historical Backdrop to the Chinese Exclusion
     Cases ..................................................................... 2349
  B. Chae Chan Ping v. United States ....................... 2351
  C. Fong Yue Ting v. United States ......................... 2354

IV. Evolution of Congress’s Plenary Power in the Detention Context .............................................. 2357
  A. Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei .......... 2357
  B. Zadvydas v. Davis ............................................. 2361
  C. Demore v. Kim .................................................. 2365

V. Analyzing the Federal Circuit Split ......................... 2371
  A. Individualized Reviews of Reasonableness .......... 2372
  B. Bright-line, Six-Month Reasonableness
     Limitation on Detention ...................................... 2378

VI. Recommendation to Resolve the Circuit Split .......... 2381
  A. Demore’s Inconsistency with Due Process Jurisprudence ........................................ 2382

---

* Candidate for J.D., Washington and Lee University School of Law, May 2018. I would like to thank the Law Review’s Editorial Board, as well as my student and faculty Note advisors, for their assistance throughout this process. I would also like to thank my family for their constant and endless love, support, and encouragement.
I. Introduction

In November 2013, Alexander Lora received word that the police were looking for him. On a Friday morning, a week before Thanksgiving, Lora stood outside his girlfriend’s apartment in Brooklyn waiting for the officers to arrive. Lora assumed it was a simple misunderstanding and was eager to clear things up, as he was starting a new job in the construction industry the following day. Instead, Lora stood in awe as five vehicles quickly pulled up the street and a group of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officers came storming towards him. According to Lora, the officers threw him against a car, handcuffed him, and told him “[y]ou’re going to get deported.”

Lora was born in the Dominican Republic, but he entered the United States as a lawful permanent resident (LPR) in 1990 when he was seven years old. Since arriving to the United States, Lora “lived continuously in Brooklyn, New York where he

3. Ungar-Sargon, supra note 1.

4. Id.

5. Id.

6. See Lora v. Shanahan, 804 F.3d 601, 606 (2d Cir. 2015) (“Lora entered the United States as a lawful permanent resident (LPR) from the Dominican Republic in 1990 when he was seven years old.”).
has a large family network, including his . . . chronically ill U.S. citizen mother, LPR father, and U.S. citizen brother and sister.”

At the time of his 2013 detention, Lora “was 31 and staying with his girlfriend in Brooklyn; they took turns caring for Lora’s son with the two-year-old’s mother, Lora’s ex.”

Lora’s 2013 detention stemmed from a 2009 arrest, where Lora and a co-worker were charged with allegedly selling cocaine. In 2010, Lora pleaded guilty to criminal possession of cocaine and was sentenced to five years’ probation. Lora “was not sentenced to any period of incarceration and he did not violate any of the conditions of his probation.”

7. Id.
9. See Hamilton, supra note 2 (“The deportation was triggered by a 2009 case in which Lora was arrested for allegedly selling cocaine from the Brooklyn bodega where he worked.”).
10. See id. (“He pleaded guilty to a possession charge and was sentenced to probation, not realizing, he says, that it would be considered a deportable offense under immigration law.”).
12. See id. at 607.
15. Id. § 1226(c).
16. Section 1226(c)(2) provides one narrow exception to mandatory detention for the purpose of witness protection. See infra note 70 for the complete text of § 1226(c)(2).
17. When possible, this Note will use the term “non-citizen” as opposed to the statutory term “alien” used by 8 U.S.C. § 1226(c). See, e.g., D. McNair Nichols, Jr., Note, Guns and Alienage: Correcting a Dangerous Contradiction, 73 WASH. & LEE L. REV. 2089, 2092 n.19 (2016) (“It seems prudent during academic discussion to avoid using the term ‘illegal alien,’ which has potentially for deportation under § 1227(a)(2)(B) or § 1227(a)(2)(A)(iii). Accordingly, the ICE officers who detained Lora in November of 2013 were acting pursuant to § 1226(c).

At the time of his 2013 detention, Lora was gainfully employed, he had extensive family ties to Brooklyn, he shared custody of his two-year-old child, and he had never been arrested for a violent crime. Unfortunately for Lora, none of these facts mattered, as § 1226(c) denied Lora the opportunity for a bond hearing to demonstrate that he was not a flight risk and posed no threat to the community. Instead, Lora was transferred to Hudson County Correctional Center (Hudson) and detained without bond pending removal proceedings.

Pursuant to § 1226(c), Lora sat in detention at Hudson with no opportunity for bail and no idea how long he would remain there. Finally, after five and a half months at Hudson, Lora received a bond hearing after successfully contesting a pejorative and inflammatory implications.

18. See Lora v. Shanahan, 804 F.3d 601, 607 (2d Cir. 2015) (“DHS took the position that Lora’s removal charges rendered him subject to mandatory detention under section 1226(c) and that he was not eligible for a bail hearing.”).

19. See Ungar-Sargon, supra note 1 (“He was starting a new job the next day that he was excited about, in construction.”).

20. See supra note 7 and accompanying text (describing Lora’s family ties to Brooklyn).

21. See Ungar-Sargon, supra note 1 (“At the time, Lora . . . took turns caring for Lora’s son with the two-year-old’s mother, Lora’s ex.”).

22. See Lora, 804 F.3d at 616 (“[H]e has no arrest record aside from this non-violent drug offense conviction . . . .”).

23. See M. Isabel Medina, Demore v. Kim—A Dance of Power and Human Rights, 18 GEO. IMMIGR. L.J. 697, 700 (2004) (“Thus, the statute on its face required detention of permanent resident aliens without a hearing and eliminated the possibility of bail in the case of a person who did not pose a flight risk and was not a danger to the community.”).

24. See Lora, 804 F.3d at 607 (“After the agents took Lora into custody, he was transferred to Hudson County Correctional Center in Kearny, New Jersey, where he was detained without bond.”).

25. See Ungar-Sargon, supra note 1 (“Alex Lora became an immigrant detainee with no trial date and no stated term limit.”).

26. See Scott Martelle, Judges Should Decide Which Deportation Cases
procedural flaw in his 2013 detention. At the hearing, an immigration judge ordered Lora’s release on bond after the parties stipulated that Lora “was not dangerous and posed no risk of flight.”

Despite Lora’s ultimate release from custody, the five and a half months in detention drastically impacted the lives of him and his family. Speaking on the aftermath of his detention, Lora told Vice News that “[i]t stresses me out, every day of my life since I was there.” While detained at Hudson, Lora lost his construction job. Even worse, Lora was alerted at Hudson that “the mother of his son attempted suicide, causing the child to be placed temporarily in foster care.”

Since his release, Lora has regained custody of his son, but he still faces potential deportation. When asked about the prospect of deportation to the Dominican Republic, a place Lora has not lived since he was seven years old, Lora replied “[w]hat am I going to do there? I’m not a stranger here, but I’m a stranger there.”

Lora’s deportation case is scheduled for 2018, and if not for a technicality, he would still be in detention while his case is

---

27. See Lora v. Shanahan, 804 F.3d 601, 605 (2d Cir. 2015)

He contended . . . that he was eligible to apply for bail because the mandatory detention provision of section 1226(c) did not apply to him because he had not been taken into custody ‘when released’ and that indefinite incarceration without an opportunity to apply for bail violated his right to due process.

28. Id.

29. Hamilton, supra note 2.

31. Hamilton, supra note 2.

32. See id. (“Lora has regained custody of his son, but he’s still fighting to stop his deportation.”).

33. Id.

Therefore, Lora is fortunate that his detention lasted only five and a half months, but the question remains, why lock Lora up at all? His entire life was turned upside down over a crime for which he was already charged and sentenced three years prior.

The United States detained approximately 441,000 non-citizens like Lora in 2013. As Lora’s story demonstrates, thousands of non-citizens languish in detention awaiting deportation determinations pursuant to § 1226(c). Additionally, § 1226(c) provides no limit to the amount of time an arrestee can be held pending removal proceedings. Accordingly, § 1226(c) requires indeterminate detention of non-citizens in Lora’s predicament, with no individualized determination as to whether detention is actually warranted.

Further, because detention under § 1226(c) continues until the conclusion of deportation proceedings, individuals like Lora “with strong ties to the United States, who have both the legal grounds and every incentive to contest their deportation . . . are

35. See supra note 27 and accompanying text (discussing Lora’s successful challenge of a procedural flaw in his 2003 detention).

36. For instance, in Ly v. Hansen, “[t]he INS took Ly into custody on May 11, 1999 and kept him in detention for 500 days before a district court ordered his release.” 351 F.3d 263, 265 (6th Cir. 2003) (emphasis added).

38. See infra notes 44–48 and accompanying text (discussing the immigration detention system in the United States).

39. See Medina, supra note 23, at 700 (“The statutory provisions concerning removal and mandatory detention do not specify the period of time in which removal must be determined nor do they provide a specific limit to the period of time within which an alien placed in removal proceedings must be detained.”).

40. See Farrin R. Anello, Due Process and Temporal Limits on Mandatory Immigration Detention, 65 HASTINGS L.J. 363, 365 (2013) (“Because immigration judges and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) view the mandatory detention law as stripping them of discretion to determine whether detention is warranted in an individual case and to set an appropriate bond, mandatory detention bears little relation to the goals of immigration enforcement.”).
detained the longest under the statute.” 41 This quandary causes many detainees “to give up on viable claims” and accept deportation simply to escape continued detention. 42 Consequently, mandatory, indeterminate detention under §1226(c) disincentivizes some detainees from challenging their deportation. 43

As to how all of this impacts United States citizens, mandatory detention under §1226(c) is part of an enormously costly immigration detention system. 44 In 2013, ICE held approximately 34,000 non-citizens like Lora in detention per day. 45 As of 2013, the daily cost of immigration detention was about $164 per person. 46 Therefore, in 2013, the federal government spent upwards of $5 million taxpayer dollars per day on immigration detention. 47 Accordingly, ICE’s 2013 annual budget for immigration detention alone was approximately $2 billion. 48

In Demore v. Kim, 49 the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of §1226(c) against Hyung Joon Kim’s claim

42. Id. at 362.
43. See Mark Noferi, Cascading Constitutional Deprivation: The Right To Appointed Counsel For Mandatorily Detained Immigrants Pending Removal Proceedings, 18 MICH. J. RACE & L. 63, 82 (2012) (“As such, the prospect of prolonged mandatory detention coerces some detainees to give up their rights and accept deportation to escape detention.”).
44. See infra notes 45–48 and accompanying text (describing the costs associated with immigration detention in the United States).
46. Id.
47. Id. (emphasis added).
48. Id.
49. Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 530 (2003). In Demore, the Court considered the constitutionality of 8 U.S.C. §1226(c), which authorized the detention of certain criminal non-citizens during removal proceedings. Id. at 514. Respondent, a lawful permanent resident of the United States, was convicted of first-degree burglary in 1996. Id. at 513. In 1997, respondent was convicted of a second crime, “petty theft with priors.” Id. The Immigration and that “his detention under § 1226(c) violated due process because the INS had made no determination that he posed either a danger to society or a flight risk.”\(^50\) In the wake of the Demore decision, the federal circuit courts continue to wrestle with how § 1226(c) can co-exist with the Fifth Amendment’s Due Process Clause.\(^51\) The result has been the emergence of a circuit split,\(^52\) with both sides acknowledging that a statute authorizing mandatory, indeterminate detention poses a constitutional problem.\(^53\) Each circuit has since interpreted § 1226(c) to contain an implicit “limit on the amount of time that an individual can be detained without a bail hearing.”\(^54\) However, the circuits remain divided as to what limit to apply.\(^55\)

Naturalization Service (INS) “charged respondent with being deportable from the United States in light of these convictions, and detained him pending his removal hearing.” Id. Respondent did not dispute the validity of his prior convictions. Id. Further, respondent did not dispute that he was “subject to mandatory detention under 8 U.S.C. § 1226(c).” Id. at 513–14. Rather, respondent challenged the constitutionality of § 1226(c) itself. Id. at 514. Respondent argued that “his detention under § 1226(c) violated due process because the INS had made no determination that he posed either a danger to society or a flight risk.” Id. In evaluating the constitutionality of § 1226(c), the Court explained that § 1226(c) “serves the purpose of preventing deportable criminal aliens from fleeing prior to or during their removal proceedings, thus increasing the chance that, if ordered removed, the aliens will be successfully removed.” Id. at 528. The Court stated that “[s]ome studies presented to Congress suggested that detention of criminal aliens during their removal proceedings might be the best way to ensure their successful removal from this country.” Id. at 521. The Court went on to assert that “Congress may make rules as to aliens that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens.” Id. at 522. Finally, the Court noted the temporary nature of detentions under § 1226(c). Id. at 530. For these reasons, the Court concluded that “[d]etention during removal proceedings is a constitutionally permissible part of the process.” Id. at 531. Therefore, the Court upheld the constitutionality of § 1226(c).

50. Id. at 514. See infra Part IV.C for further analysis of Demore.

51. See U.S. CONST. amend. V (providing that “[n]o person shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law” (emphasis added)).

52. See infra Part V for further discussion of the federal circuit split.

53. See Reid v. Donelan, 819 F.3d 486, 494 (1st Cir. 2016) (“And, each circuit has found it necessary to read an implicit reasonableness requirement into the statute itself, generally based on the doctrine of constitutional avoidance.”).

54. Lora v. Shanahan, 804 F.3d 601, 614 (2d Cir. 2015).

55. See id. at 614 (“[W]hile all circuits agree that section 1226(c) includes
The Second\textsuperscript{56} and Ninth\textsuperscript{57} Circuits read a six-month limitation into the statute, at which point detention becomes presumptively unreasonable.\textsuperscript{58} In contrast, the First,\textsuperscript{59} Third,\textsuperscript{60} and Sixth\textsuperscript{61} Circuits opt for individualized reviews to determine whether detention has become unreasonable.\textsuperscript{62}

This Note proceeds as follows: Part II lays out the background and intended purpose of § 1226(c).\textsuperscript{63} Part III delves into the origin of Congress’s plenary power over immigration regulation.\textsuperscript{64} Part IV discusses the evolution of Congress’s plenary power in the detention context.\textsuperscript{65} Part V discusses the current circuit split regarding interpretation and application of § 1226(c).\textsuperscript{66} Part VI posits that non-citizens within the United States receive the same due process rights as citizens.\textsuperscript{67}

\footnotesize
\begin{itemize}
\item some ‘reasonable’ limit on the amount of time that an individual can be detained without a bail hearing, courts remain divided on how to determine reasonableness.”).
\item See \textit{id.} at 616 (“[W]e hold that, in order to avoid the constitutional concerns raised by indefinite detention, an immigrant detained pursuant to section 1226(c) must be afforded a bail hearing before an immigration judge within six months of his or her detention.”).
\item See Rodriguez v. Robbins, 715 F.3d 1127, 1138 (9th Cir. 2013) (“Therefore, subclass members who have been detained under § 1226(c) for six months are entitled to a bond hearing . . . .”).
\item See \textit{infra} Part V.B for further analysis of the Second and Ninth Circuits’ interpretations of § 1226(c).
\item See Reid, 819 F.3d at 501 (“Our ruling today, \textit{requiring an individualized approach}, removes that predicate.” (emphasis added)).
\item See Diop v. ICE/Homeland Sec., 656 F.3d 221, 232–33 (3d Cir. 2011) (“At a certain point, continued detention becomes unreasonable . . . . This will necessarily be a fact-dependent inquiry that will vary depending on individual circumstances. We decline to establish a universal point at which detention always be considered unreasonable.”).
\item See Ly v. Hansen, 351 F.3d 263, 274 (6th Cir. 2003) (“We hold that the INS may detain \textit{prima facie} removable criminal aliens, without bond, for a reasonable period of time . . . . The reasonableness of the length of detention is subject to review by federal courts in habeas proceedings . . . .”).
\item See \textit{infra} Part V.A for further analysis of the First, Third, and Sixth Circuits’ interpretations of § 1226(c).
\item \textit{Infra} Part II.
\item \textit{Infra} Part III.
\item \textit{Infra} Part IV.
\item \textit{Infra} Part V.
\item \textit{Infra} Part VI.
\end{itemize}
Accordingly, this Note argues that § 1226(c), as applied by the Demore Court and the federal circuit courts, fails to provided non-citizen detainees with adequate due process.

II. Examining 8 U.S.C. § 1226(c)

A. Background and Impact of § 1226(c)

In 1996, Congress passed the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act (IIRIRA), 68 "which substantially altered many provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act." 69 Pursuant to the IIRIRA, Congress enacted 8 U.S.C. § 1226(c), 70 which requires detention of certain criminal

---

70. 8 U.S.C. § 1226(c) (2012)
non-citizens during removal proceedings. Additionally, § 1226(c) does not provide arrestees with a bond hearing. Further, “[t]he statutory provisions concerning removal and mandatory detention do not specify the period of time in which removal must be determined nor do they provide a specific limit to the period of time within which an alien placed in removal proceedings must be detained.” Accordingly, § 1226(c) requires detention of non-citizens for the duration of removal proceedings, regardless of how long those proceedings take.

---

72. See Anello, supra note 40, at 363 (“Since 1996, the Immigration and Nationality Act has required the government to take into custody individuals in removal proceedings who have past convictions for any of a wide range of criminal offenses.”); see also Medina, supra note 23, at 699–700 (“One of the most problematic changes was the statute at issue in Demore v. Kim, which again mandated detention of all permanent resident aliens placed in removal proceedings because of a criminal conviction or because they have engaged in terrorist activities.”).

73. See Travis Silva, Note, Toward a Constitutionalized Theory of Immigration Detention, 31 YALE L. & POL’Y REV. 227, 254 (2012) (“Section 1226(c) does not entitle the noncitizen to any process weighing the traditional bail factors, including his risk of flight and ties to the community.”).

74. Medina, supra note 23, at 700.

75. See id. (“Thus, the statute on its face required detention of permanent resident aliens without a hearing and eliminated the possibility of bail in the case of a person who did not pose a flight risk and was not a danger to the community.”).
B. Legislative History of § 1226(c)

A 1995 Senate Report76 from the Committee of Governmental Affairs provides insight into the circumstances surrounding the passage of § 1226(c).77 The Committee described the state of immigration law at the time of enactment in dire terms.78

To the issue of deportation, the Committee asserted that “[d]espite previous efforts in Congress to require detention of criminal aliens while deportation hearings are pending, many who should be detained are released on bond.”79 Consequently, the Committee stated that “[o]ver 20 percent of nondetained criminal aliens fail to appear for deportation proceedings.”80 Further, the Committee noted that “[u]ndetained criminal aliens with deportation orders . . . receive[e] a final notification from the INS that requires them to voluntarily report for removal.”81 Predominantly, some non-citizens fail to voluntarily report for their own deportation.82 In an effort to remedy this issue, the Committee suggested that the Immigration and Naturalization

76. See infra Part IV.C for further discussion of the Demore Court’s use and analysis of the Senate Report.

America’s immigration system is in disarray and criminal aliens (non-U.S. citizens residing in the U.S. who commit serious crimes for which they may be deportable) constitute a particularly vexing part of the problem . . . . Criminal aliens are a serious and growing threat to public safety that costs our criminal justice systems hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

For additional analysis of the legislative history and purpose of § 1226(c), see Gerard Savaresse, Note, When Is When?: 8 U.S.C. § 1226(C) and the Requirements of Mandatory Detention, 82 FORDHAM L. REV. 285, 299 (2013).

78. See S. Rep. No. 104-48, at 1 (“[T]he deportation system is in such disarray that no one, including the Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, can even say with certainty how many criminal aliens are currently subject to the jurisdiction of our criminal justice system.”).

79. Id. at 2.

80. Id.

81. Id.

82. See id. at 24 (“This notice is often referred to by INS officials as the ‘run notice’ since, as one would expect, criminal aliens who have received written notices to report for deportation often fail to appear for their actual deportation.”).
Service (INS) should detain more non-citizens during removal proceedings.\textsuperscript{83}

III. Chinese Exclusion Cases and the Origin of the Plenary Power Doctrine

At the heart of this Note lies the underlying question of whether a statute authorizing mandatory, indeterminate detention without a bond hearing violates the due process rights of non-citizens.\textsuperscript{84} In upholding the constitutionality of § 1226(c), the \textit{Demore} Court partially relied on Congress’s plenary power\textsuperscript{85} to regulate immigration.\textsuperscript{86} The Court first articulated the plenary power doctrine in the so-called Chinese Exclusion Cases.\textsuperscript{87}

A. Historical Backdrop to the Chinese Exclusion Cases

\textsuperscript{83} See id. at 4 (“Problems of undetained criminal aliens who fail to appear or who abscond after they are ordered deported would be lessened if the INS detained more criminal aliens.”).

\textsuperscript{84} See U.S. CONST. amend. V (providing that “[n]o person shall be . . . deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law” (emphasis added)).

\textsuperscript{85} See Gabriel J. Chin, Chae Chan Ping and Fong Yue Ting: The Origins of Plenary Power, in IMMIGRATION STORIES 7, 7 (David A. Martin & Peter H. Schuck eds., 2005) (“Anxiety over Asian immigration . . . spawned a pair of late nineteenth century Supreme Court cases establishing the principle that Congress possesses plenary power to regulate discrimination . . . . The message from these cases . . . is that where the status of immigrants is concerned, almost anything goes.”).

\textsuperscript{87} See Natsu Taylor Saito, The Enduring Effect of the Chinese Exclusion Cases: The “Plenary Power” Justification for On-Going Abuses of Human Rights, 10 ASIAN L.J. 13, 14 (2003) (“The plenary power doctrine was first articulated in the immigration context in the Chinese exclusion cases.”); see also DAVID A. MARTIN & PETER H. SCHUCK, IMMIGRATION STORIES 2 (2005) (“Chae Chan Ping v. United States . . . and Fong Yue Ting v. United States . . . are regarded as the foundation stones for the plenary power doctrine.”).
In 1868, the United States and China entered into the Burlingame Treaty,\(^{88}\) which recognized “the inherent and inalienable right of a man to change his home and allegiance.”\(^{89}\) Under the Treaty, “[t]ravelers from one country to the other were entitled to ‘the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence, as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.’”\(^{90}\) Accordingly, the Treaty ushered in an era of Chinese immigration to the United States,\(^{91}\) particularly to partake in the so-called California gold rush.\(^{92}\)

However, there was a backlash on the West Coast to this influx of Chinese immigration,\(^{93}\) for many of the same reasons some Americans denounce immigration today.\(^{94}\) In response to the immense backlash, Congress passed the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882.\(^{95}\)

---

88. See Chin, supra note 85, at 8 (“This immigration was specifically authorized by the Burlingame Treaty, concluded between China and the United States in 1868.”).

89. Burlingame Treaty, U.S.-P.R.C., July 28, 1868, 16 Stat. 739; Chin, supra note 85, at 8.

90. Chin, supra note 85, at 8 (quoting 16 Stat. 739, 740 (July 28, 1868)).

91. See id. (“Between 1870 and 1880, 138,941 Chinese migrated to the United States . . . .”).

92. See id. at 7–8 (“Chinese came to the country they called ‘Gold Mountain’ to participate in the California gold rush, and their numbers grew slowly.”).

93. See id. at 8 (“By the mid-1870s, however, California and other western states demanded restriction of Chinese immigration . . . .”); see also Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U.S. 581, 595–96 (1889) (discussing the factors that led to a demand for restriction of Chinese immigration).

94. Justice Field’s summary of the backlash to Chinese immigration in 1889 echoes many of the same assertions made in modern times. Justice Field spoke of contention regarding employment opportunities, a lack of assimilation, and a fear of the minority one day becoming the majority. See Chae Chan Ping, 130 U.S. at 594–95.

[T]hey began to engage in various mechanical pursuits and trades, and thus came in competition with our artisans and mechanics, as well as our laborers in the field . . . . It seemed impossible for them to assimilate with our people . . . As they grew in numbers each year the people of the coast saw, or believed they saw . . . great danger that at no distant day that portion of our country would be overrun by them . . . .
Act in 1882, which “suspended immigration of Chinese laborers for ten years.” In 1884, a subsequent Act mandated that any Chinese immigrants wishing to temporarily leave the United States must obtain certificates for re-entry. However, as seen in Chae Chan Ping v. United States, Congress later declared such certificates null and void.

B. Chae Chan Ping v. United States

Chae Chan Ping immigrated to the United States in 1875. In 1887, Ping obtained a re-entry certificate and departed for a return visit to China. While Ping was abroad, Congress passed the Scott Act in response to continued backlash against Chinese immigration. The Scott Act prohibited the entry or re-entry of all Chinese laborers, including those holding re-entry certificates. In 1888, Ping returned to the United States, arriving via the steamship Belgic to a port in San Francisco.\textsuperscript{105} At the port, Ping presented his certificate for re-entry into the United States.\textsuperscript{106} The collector at the port, acting pursuant to the Scott Act, refused to accept Ping’s certificate.\textsuperscript{107} Subsequently, the captain of the Belgic detained Ping on board the ship because Ping’s re-entry certificate “had been declared void while he was at sea.”\textsuperscript{108}

On a writ of habeas corpus, the Circuit Court, Northern District of California heard Ping’s petition for release from unlawful custody.\textsuperscript{109} The Circuit Court ruled that Ping was not entitled to enter the United States and ordered that Ping remain in custody on board the ship.\textsuperscript{110} On appeal to the Supreme Court, Ping argued that the Scott Act violated his right to re-enter and work in the United States.\textsuperscript{111} Ping asserted that the Burlingame Treaty and the statutes passed to execute it vested such rights to Chinese laborers.\textsuperscript{112}

In evaluating Ping’s claim, the Court recognized that the Scott Act violated the spirit of the Burlingame Treaty and the statutes passed to execute it.\textsuperscript{113} However, the Court stated that when a treaty and statute both fall within the purview of Congress, the last in time rule applies.\textsuperscript{114}

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{105} See \textit{Chae Chan Ping}, 130 U.S. at 582 (“On the 7th of September, 1888, the appellant, on his return to California, sailed from Hong Kong in the steam-ship Belgic, which arrived within the port of San Francisco on the 8th of October following.”).
  \item \textsuperscript{106} \textit{Id.}
  \item \textsuperscript{107} \textit{Id.}
  \item \textsuperscript{108} Chin, \textit{supra} note 85, at 11.
  \item \textsuperscript{109} \textit{Chae Chan Ping v. United States}, 130 U.S. 581, 582 (1889).
  \item \textsuperscript{110} \textit{Id.}
  \item \textsuperscript{111} See \textit{id.} at 589 (“The validity of the act is assailed as being in effect an expulsion from the country of Chinese laborers, in violation of existing treaties between the United States and the government of China, and of rights vested in them under the laws of congress.”).
  \item \textsuperscript{112} \textit{Id.}
  \item \textsuperscript{113} See \textit{id.} at 600 (“It must be conceded that the act of 1888 is in contravention of express stipulations of the treaty of 1868, and of the supplemental treaty of 1880 . . . .”).
  \item \textsuperscript{114} See \textit{id.}
\end{itemize}
More consequential for this discussion, the Court “characterized Ping's certificate as a license... [which] may typically be revoked at any time.” Therefore, the Court classified those rights vested to immigrants under treaties and statutes as contractual in nature and subject to the will of Congress. In essence, the Court’s ruling granted Congress the ability to limit or revoke such rights at will. The Court's Chae Chan Ping opinion laid the foundation for Congress's plenary power over immigration regulation. Writing for the Court, Justice Field did not cite to any provisions in the Constitution granting Congress with such authority over immigration. Rather, Justice Field viewed Congress's power over immigration as inherent to protect the sovereignty and security of the country. Justice Field asserted that a foreign sovereign could invade the United States through a state-sanctioned invasion or through “vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us.” Consequently, Justice Field stated that equivalent of a legislative act, to be repealed or modified at the pleasure of congress. In either case the last expression of the sovereign will must control.

116. See Chae Chan Ping, 130 U.S. at 600 (“A treaty, it is true, is in its nature a contract between nations, and is often merely promissory in its character, requiring legislation to carry its stipulations into effect. Such legislation will be open to future repeal or amendment.”).

117. See, e.g., id. at 609 (“Whatever license, therefore, Chinese laborers may have obtained, previous to the act of October 1, 1888, to return to the United States after their departure, is held at the will of the government, revocable at any time, at its [p]leasure.”); Silva, supra note 73, at 232 (“In other words, though the country may have entered into a binding commitment under international law, Congress’s decision to subsequently exclude the entry of Chinese immigrants was absolute and judicially unreviewable.”).

118. See Chin, supra note 85, at 13 (“The innovative ground of the Supreme Court's decision, which had not been focused on in the circuit court, was the breadth of federal power over immigration.”).

119. See id. at 13–14 (“The Court recognized this authority not from any particular provision of the Constitution, but as inherent in sovereignty . . . .”).

120. See id. at 14 (“The Court’s understanding of the scope of the power may have been influenced by the circumstances under which it was exercised. It regarded the exclusion of the Chinese as almost a war measure . . . .”).

Congress possessed “sovereign powers delegated by the constitution”\textsuperscript{122} to counter either type of foreign encroachment.\textsuperscript{123} Further, Justice Field concluded that Congressional actions that deter either type of encroachment would be “conclusive upon the judiciary.”\textsuperscript{124} Accordingly, the Court affirmed the Circuit Court’s ruling against Ping.\textsuperscript{125} Over one hundred years later, “\textit{Chae Chan Ping} remains good law today and continues to support the federal government’s . . . power to regulate and enforce immigration law.”\textsuperscript{126}

C. Fong Yue Ting v. United States

On May 5, 1892, one day before the Chinese Exclusion Act was set to expire, President Harrison signed into law the Geary Act,\textsuperscript{127} which was “[a]n act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States.”\textsuperscript{128} Among other provisions, the

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{122}See id. at 609 (“The power of exclusion of foreigners being an incident of sovereignty belonging to the government of the United States as a part of those sovereign powers delegated by the constitution, cannot be granted away or restrained on behalf of any one.”).
\item \textsuperscript{123}See id. at 606
\begin{quote}
The government, possessing the powers which are to be exercised for protection and security, is clothed with authority to determine the occasion on which the powers shall be called forth; and its determinations, so far as the subjects affected are concerned, are necessarily conclusive upon all its departments and officers. If, therefore, the government of the United States, through its legislative department, considers the presence of foreigners of a different race in this country, who will not assimilate with us, to be dangerous to its peace and security, their exclusion is not to be stayed because at the time there are no actual hostilities with the nation of which the foreigners are subjects.
\end{quote}
\item \textsuperscript{124}See id. (“The existence of war would render the necessity of the proceeding only more obvious and pressing. The same necessity . . . may arise when war does not exist . . . . In both cases its determination is conclusive upon the judiciary.”).
\item \textsuperscript{125}Id. at 611.
\item \textsuperscript{126}Villazor, supra note 115, at 138.
\item \textsuperscript{127}Geary Act, ch. 60, 27 Stat. 25 (1892).
\item \textsuperscript{128}See Chin, supra note 85, at 16 (“On May 5, 1892, one day before the original act would have lapsed, President Harrison signed into law the Geary Act, a new and yet sterner measure. The Act was entitled ‘An Act to prohibit the Act provided that all Chinese laborers in the United States must obtain a certificate of residence within one year of the Act’s passage.\textsuperscript{129} Under the Act, any Chinese laborer “found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence, shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully within the United States.”\textsuperscript{130} Pursuant to the Act, Chinese laborers found without a certificate of residence were “brought to a U.S. judge, who would order deportation.”\textsuperscript{131}

In \textit{Fong Yue Ting v. United States},\textsuperscript{132} the Court granted three writs of habeas corpus “upon petitions of Chinese laborers arrested and held by the marshal of the district for not having certificates of residence.”\textsuperscript{133} The issue before the Court was whether Congress’s “sovereign powers delegated by the constitution”\textsuperscript{134} extended beyond “the exclusion of those first arriving to the deportation of permanent residents.”\textsuperscript{135} The Court ruled in the affirmative,\textsuperscript{136} further solidifying Congress’s plenary power to regulate immigration.\textsuperscript{137}

\textsuperscript{129} See Geary Act § 6 (“And it shall be the duty of all Chinese laborers within the limits of the United States . . . to apply to the collector of internal revenue of their respective districts, within no year after the passage of this act, for a certificate of residence . . . .”).

\textsuperscript{130} Chin, \textit{supra} note 85, at 17 (quoting Geary Act § 6).

\textsuperscript{131} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{132} 149 U.S. 698 (1893).

\textsuperscript{133} \textit{Id.} at 699.

\textsuperscript{134} Chae Chan Ping v. United States, 130 U.S. 581, 609 (1889).

\textsuperscript{135} Saito, \textit{supra} note 87, at 16.

\textsuperscript{136} See \textit{Fong Yue Ting}, 149 U.S. at 707 (“The right of a nation to expel or deport foreigners who have not been naturalized, or taken any steps towards becoming citizens of the country, rests upon the same grounds, and is as absolute and unqualified, as the right to prohibit and prevent their entrance into the country.”).

\textsuperscript{137} See \textit{id.} at 731

The question whether, and upon what conditions, these aliens shall be permitted to remain within the United States being one to be determined by the political departments of the government, the judicial department cannot properly express an opinion upon the wisdom, the policy, or the justice of the measures enacted by congress in the exercise of the powers confided to it by the constitution over this subject.
However, unlike the unanimous Chae Chan Ping decision, the Fong Yue Ting majority faced substantial opposition. Most notable was Justice Field’s dissent, considering he wrote the majority opinion in Chae Chan Ping. In his dissenting opinion, Justice Field observed a fundamental distinction between the rights of non-citizens first arriving to the United States and non-citizens already in the country. Justice Field believed that non-citizens within the United States should receive the same constitutional rights and protections as citizens. Accordingly, Justice Field objected to the Majority extending his Chae Chan Ping decision to limit the rights of non-citizens residing in the United States.

---

138. See supra Part III.B (discussing the Supreme Court’s decision in Chae Chan Ping).

139. See Chin, supra note 85, at 19 (“Unlike Chae Chan Ping, there was substantial opposition to the majority’s view.”).

140. See supra notes 118–126 and accompanying text (discussing Justice Field’s majority opinion in Chae Chan Ping).

141. See Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 746 (1893) (Field, J., dissenting) (“[B]etween legislation for the exclusion of Chinese persons, that is, to prevent them from entering the country, and legislation for the deportation of those who have acquired a residence in the country under a treaty with China, there is a wide and essential difference.”).

142. See id. at 754

Aliens from countries at peace with us, domiciled within our country by its consent, are entitled to all the guaranties for the protection of their persons and property which are secured to native-born citizens. The moment any human being from a country at peace with us comes within the jurisdiction of the United States . . . he becomes subject to all their laws, is amenable to their punishment, and entitled to their protection . . . . To hold that they are subject to any different law, or are less protected in any particular, than other persons, is, in my judgment, to ignore the teachings of our history, the practice of our government, and the language of our constitution.

143. See id. 149 U.S. at 760

The decision of the court, and the sanction it would give to legislation depriving resident aliens of the guaranties of the constitution, fill me with apprehensions. Those guaranties are of priceless value to every one resident in the country, whether citizen or alien. I cannot but regard the decision as a blow against constitutional liberty, when it declares that congress has the right to disregard the guaranties of the constitution intended for the protection of all men domiciled in the country with the consent of the government, in their rights of person and property.
IV. Evolution of Congress’s Plenary Power in the Detention Context

The Supreme Court continued to uphold Congress’s plenary power throughout the twentieth century. However, the Court began to draw a distinction between the due process rights of non-citizens first arriving to the United States and those already in the country. The following cases track the evolution of Congress’s plenary power as applied to the detention of non-citizens.

A. Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei

Ignatz Mezei lived in the United States from 1923 to 1948. In May of 1948, Mezei “sailed to Europe, apparently to visit his dying mother in Rumania.” Mezei attempted to return to the United States in February of 1950. However, upon arrival in New York, Mezei found himself temporarily excluded from the United States pursuant to the Passport Act. Immigration authorities directed Mezei to Ellis Island to await further disposition of his case. The Attorney General, acting pursuant to the Passport Act, ordered Mezei’s “temporary exclusion to be

---

144. See infra note 329 and accompanying text (providing extensive Supreme Court precedent delineating the due process rights of non-citizens).
146. Id.
147. Id.
148. See id. (“Upon arrival on February 9, 1950, he was temporarily excluded from the United States by an immigration inspector acting pursuant to the Passport Act as amended and regulations thereunder.”); see also id. at 210–11
149. See id. at 208 (“Pending disposition of his case he was received at Ellis Island.”).
made permanent without a hearing before a board of special inquiry, on the basis of information of a confidential nature, the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interest.”

In 1951, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York sustained Mezei’s writ of habeas corpus and reviewed the Attorney General’s order. At this time, Mezei had been detained without a hearing for twenty-one months. The District Judge requested that the Government provide evidence of the threat to public safety justifying Mezei’s continued detention. When the Government refused to provide such information, the District Judge ruled for Mezei’s “conditional parole on bond.” The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the District Judge’s ruling. In 1953, the Supreme Court granted certiorari and considered whether “the Attorney General’s continued exclusion of respondent without a hearing amounts to an unlawful detention.”

In examining Mezei’s predicament, the Supreme Court saw the issue as one of exclusion rather than detention. In its opinion, the Court referenced Chae Chan Ping and Congress’s non-justiciable plenary power to exclude non-citizens from entering the United States. Accordingly, the Court upheld the

150. Id. (emphasis added).
151. Id. at 209.
152. Id.
153. See id. (“The District Judge, vexed by the problem of ‘an alien who has no place to go’, did not question the validity of the exclusion order but deemed further ‘detention’ after 21 months excessive and justifiable only by affirmative proof of respondent’s danger to the public safety.”).
154. Id.
155. Id.
156. Id. at 207.
157. See, e.g., id. (“This case concerns an alien immigrant permanently excluded from the United States . . . .”); id. at 213 (“Neither respondent’s harborage on Ellis Island nor his prior residence here transforms this into something other than an exclusion proceeding.”); Christopher R. Yukins, The Measure of a Nation: Granting Excludable Aliens Fundamental Protections of Due Process, 73 Va. L. Rev. 1501, 1528 (1987) (“The Supreme Court, unlike the lower courts, focused its inquiry in Mezi on exclusion, rather than detention.”).
158. See supra Part III.B for a discussion of Chae Chan Ping v. United States.
159. See Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 210
Passport Act as valid Congressional action in furtherance of its plenary power over immigration.\textsuperscript{160}

However, in a stark departure from the Chinese Exclusion Cases,\textsuperscript{161} the Court stated that “a lawful resident alien may not captiously be deprived of his constitutional rights to procedural due process.”\textsuperscript{162} Therefore, according to the Court, continued exclusion of a “lawful resident alien” without a hearing would violate that individual’s due process rights. Accordingly, the Court sought to determine whether Mezei’s two-year harborage at Ellis Island or his residency in the United States prior to departing rendered him a “lawful resident alien.”\textsuperscript{163}

First, the Court determined that, despite Mezei’s prior residency in the United States, he would not be treated differently than any other non-citizen attempting to enter the United States.\textsuperscript{164} Regarding Mezei’s continued exclusion at Ellis Island, the Court asserted that “such temporary harborage, an act of legislative grace, bestows no additional rights.”\textsuperscript{165}

\textsuperscript{(1953)} ("Courts have long recognized the power to expel or exclude aliens as a fundamental sovereign attribute exercised by the Government’s political departments largely immune from judicial control."); see also id. at 212 ("Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned.” (quoting United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 544 (1950))).

\textsuperscript{160} See id. at 210 ("In the exercise of these powers, Congress expressly authorized the President to impose additional restrictions on aliens entering or leaving the United States during periods of international tension and strife. That authorization, originally enacted in the Passport Act of 1918, continues in effect during the present emergency.").

\textsuperscript{161} See supra Part III for a discussion of the Chinese Exclusion Cases.

\textsuperscript{162} Mezei, 345 U.S. at 213.

\textsuperscript{163} Id. at 213–15.

\textsuperscript{164} See id. at 213 (“For purposes of the immigration laws, moreover, the legal incidents of an alien’s entry remain unaltered whether he has been here once before or not. He is an entering alien just the same, and may be excluded if unqualified for admission under existing immigration laws.”); see also id. at 214

[R]espondent, apparently without authorization or reentry papers, simply left the United States and remained behind the Iron Curtain for 19 months. Moreover . . . § 307 of the 1940 Nationality Act . . . deems protracted absence such as respondent’s a clear break in an alien’s continuous residence here. In such circumstances, we have no difficulty in holding respondent an entrant alien . . . .

\textsuperscript{165} Id. at 215; see also id. (“Congress meticulously specified that such shelter ashore ‘shall not be considered a landing’ . . . And this Court has long
Therefore, the Court concluded that neither Mezei’s two-year “harborage on Ellis Island nor his prior residence here transforms this into something other than an exclusion proceeding.”

After determining Mezei’s non-resident status, the Court reversed the Second Circuit and denied Mezei’s release from Ellis Island on bond. Additionally, as a non-resident, the Court found that Mezei’s continued exclusion at Ellis Island did not deprive him of any statutory or constitutional right.

Despite Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei’s continued observance of Congress’s plenary power over immigration, the opinion denotes a shift in the Court’s attitude toward the rights of non-citizens in the United States. Straying from the Fong Yue Ting majority opinion, the Mezei Court instead applied Justice Field’s distinction between the rights of non-citizens arriving to the United States and those already in the country. The Mezei Court recognized Congress’s plenary power toward “alien[s] on the threshold of initial entry” into the United States. However, the Court also stated that non-citizens residing in the United States should receive due process considered such temporary arrangements as not affecting an alien’s status; he is treated as if stopped at the border.”)

---

166. Id. at 213.
167. Id. at 216.
168. See id. at 215 (“Thus we do not think that respondent’s continued exclusion deprives him of any statutory or constitutional right.”).
170. See id. at 210 (“Courts have long recognized the power to expel or exclude aliens as a fundamental sovereign attribute exercised by the Government’s political departments largely immune from judicial control.”).
171. See Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698, 707 (1893) (“The right of a nation to expel or deport foreigners who have not been naturalized, or taken any steps towards becoming citizens of the country, rests upon the same grounds, and is as absolute and unqualified, as the right to prohibit and prevent their entrance into the country.”).
172. See supra notes 140–143 and accompanying text for further discussion of Justice Field’s Fong Yue Ting dissent.
173. See Mezei, 345 U.S. at 212 (“But an alien on the threshold of initial entry stands on a different footing: Whatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as an alien denied entry is concerned.” (quoting U.S. ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 544 (1950))).
protections.\textsuperscript{174} Therefore, under \textit{Mezei}, Congress’s plenary power no longer trumps the due process rights of “lawful resident aliens” in the United States.

\textbf{B. Zadvydas v. Davis}

In \textit{Zadvydas v. Davis},\textsuperscript{175} the Court considered two separate instances of continued detention\textsuperscript{176} pursuant to 8 U.S.C. \textsection 1231.\textsuperscript{177} The Court consolidated the two cases and decided them together.\textsuperscript{178}

First, the Court discussed the case of Kestutis Zadvydas, a German citizen who had lived in the United States since immigrating with his parents when he was eight years old.\textsuperscript{179} After a series of arrests, the INS took Zadvydas into custody and ordered him deported to Germany.\textsuperscript{180} However, Germany refused to accept Zadvydas, which left him in custody indefinitely while the INS considered alternative options.\textsuperscript{181}

The second case the Court examined was that of Kim Ho Ma.\textsuperscript{182} Similar to Zadvydas, Ma was born overseas but lived in Japan until she was nine years old. On her return to the United States, she was questioned by the INS and then deported to China.\textsuperscript{183} China refused to accept her, which left her in the INS’s custody.

\textsuperscript{174} \textit{See id.} ("It is true that aliens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law."); \textit{id.} at 213 ("To be sure, a lawful resident alien may not captiously be deprived of his constitutional rights to procedural due process.").

\textsuperscript{175} 533 U.S. 678 (2001).

\textsuperscript{176} \textit{See id.} at 686 ("Zadvydas asked us to review the decision of the Fifth Circuit authorizing his continued detention. The Government asked us to review the decision of the Ninth Circuit forbidding Ma’s continued detention. We granted writs in both cases, agreeing to consider both statutory and related constitutional questions.").

\textsuperscript{177} 8 U.S.C. \textsection 1231 (2012).

\textsuperscript{178} \textit{See Zadvydas}, 533 U.S. at 686 ("We consolidated the two cases for argument; and we now decide them together.").

\textsuperscript{179} \textit{Id.} at 684.

\textsuperscript{180} \textit{See id.} ("Most recently, he was convicted of possessing, with intent to distribute, cocaine; sentenced to 16 years’ imprisonment; released on parole after two years; taken into INS custody; and, in 1994, ordered deported to Germany.").

\textsuperscript{181} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{182} \textit{Id.} at 685.
the United States since he was seven years old.\footnote{183} After serving two years for a manslaughter conviction, the INS took Ma into custody and ordered him deported.\footnote{184} Ma’s detention also continued indefinitely while the INS worked to finalize his deportation.\footnote{185}

Section 1231(a)(1)(A) states that “when an alien is ordered removed, the Attorney General shall remove the alien from the United States within a period of 90 days . . . .”\footnote{186} Additionally, § 1231(a)(2) requires that the Government detain non-citizens ordered deported during this ninety-day period.\footnote{187} Further, § 1231(a)(6) allows the Government to detain non-citizens ordered deported beyond the ninety-day removal period\footnote{188} in certain circumstances.\footnote{189} At issue in \textit{Zadvydas} was whether § 1231(a)(6) authorized indefinite detention of non-citizens following a deportation order.\footnote{190} The Government asserted that

\begin{quote}
\footnote{183} Id. \\
\footnote{184} See id. (“In 1995, at age 17, Ma was involved in a gang-related shooting, convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to 38 months’ imprisonment. He served two years, after which he was released into INS custody. In light of his conviction of an ‘aggravated felony,’ Ma was ordered removed.”). \\ \footnote{185} Id. at 685–86. \\
\footnote{186} 8 U.S.C. § 1231(a)(1)(A) (2012). \\
\footnote{187} See id. § 1231(a)(2) (“During the removal period, the Attorney General shall detain the alien. Under no circumstance during the removal period shall the Attorney General release an alien who has been found inadmissible under section 1182(a)(2) or 1182(a)(3)(B) of this title or deportable under section 1227(a)(2) or 1227(a)(4)(B) of this title.”). \\
\footnote{188} See id. § 1231(a)(6) (“An alien ordered removed . . . may be detained beyond the removal period . . . .”). \\
\footnote{189} See id. \\
An alien ordered removed who is inadmissible under section 1182 of this title, removable under section 1227(a)(1)(C), 1227(a)(2), or 1227(a)(4) of this title or who has been determined by the Attorney General to be a risk to the community or unlikely to comply with the order of removal, may be detained beyond the removal period . . . .” \\
\footnote{190} See \textit{Zadvydas v. Davis}, 533 U.S. 678, 682 (2001) (“In these cases, we must decide whether this post-removal-period statute authorizes the Attorney General to detain a removable alien \textit{indefinitely} beyond the removal period or only for a period \textit{reasonably necessary} to secure the alien’s removal.”).}

the statute’s plain language provided the Attorney General with such authority.\textsuperscript{191}

Two key developments arose in \textit{Zadvydas}. First, in response to the Government’s claim that under \textit{Mezei}, “alien status itself can justify indefinite detention,”\textsuperscript{192} the Court distinguished \textit{Zadvydas} from \textit{Mezei}\textsuperscript{193} on the ground that \textit{Mezei}, unlike \textit{Zadvydas}, involved a non-resident “‘treated,’ for constitutional purposes, ‘as if stopped at the border.’”\textsuperscript{194} Importantly, the Court then stated that “once an alien enters the country, the legal circumstance changes, for the Due Process Clause applies to all ‘persons’ within the United States, including aliens, whether their presence here is lawful, unlawful, temporary, or permanent.”\textsuperscript{195} Accordingly, the Court further bolstered the distinction between non-citizens arriving to the United States and non-citizens already residing in the country.\textsuperscript{196}

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{191} See id. at 689
\item The Government argues that the statute means what it literally says. It sets no “limit on the length of time beyond the removal period that an alien who falls within one of the Section 1231(a)(6) categories may be detained.” Hence, “whether to continue to detain such an alien and, if so, in what circumstances and for how long” is up to the Attorney General, not up to the courts. (quoting Brief for Petitioners in No. 00–38, p. 22).
\item \textsuperscript{192} Id. at 692.
\item \textsuperscript{193} See supra Part IV.A (discussing the Supreme Court’s decision in \textit{Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei}).
\item \textsuperscript{194} \textit{Zadvydas}, 533 U.S. at 693 (quoting \textit{Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei}, 345 U.S. 206, 215 (1953)). See also Medina, supra note 23, at 708 (“Instead of overruling the case, the \textit{Zadvydas} Court distinguished \textit{Mezei} on the grounds that it involved an alien who had not entered the United States.”); Susan Marx, Comment, \textit{Throwing Away the Key: The Constitutionality of the Indefinite Detention of Inadmissible Aliens}, 35 Tex. Tech L. Rev. 1259, 1273 (2004)
\item While Mezei was an alien who had not yet entered the United States and was therefore not sheltered by Constitutional protections, \textit{Zadvydas} and Ma were within the confines of the country and were therefore entitled to Due Process. The Court determined that these facts were too different to be treated equally and thus that the \textit{Mezei} decision did not control \textit{Zadvydas}.
\item \textsuperscript{195} \textit{Zadvydas}, 533 U.S. at 693.
\item \textsuperscript{196} See id. (“The distinction between an alien who has effected an entry into the United States and one who has never entered runs throughout immigration law . . . . It is well established that certain constitutional
The second major development in Zadvydas was the Court’s position on Congress’s plenary power to regulate immigration.\textsuperscript{197} The Government argued that the statute at issue regulated immigration-related matters, and because of Congress’s plenary power in this field, the judiciary should “defer to Executive and Legislative Branch decisionmaking in that area.”\textsuperscript{198} In response, the Court stressed that Congress’s plenary power “is subject to important constitutional limitations.”\textsuperscript{199}

Ultimately, the Court asserted that a statute permitting indefinite detention of resident non-citizens would raise a constitutional problem.\textsuperscript{200} Accordingly, it appeared that the Court, in contrast to the prior cases discussed,\textsuperscript{201} was poised to strike down the relevant statute as unconstitutional. However, the Court instead applied the constitutional avoidance doctrine to sidestep addressing the statute’s constitutionality.\textsuperscript{202}

Under the constitutional avoidance doctrine, “when an Act of Congress raises ‘a serious doubt’ as to its constitutionality, [the] protections available to persons inside the United States are unavailable to aliens outside of our geographic borders.”

\textsuperscript{197} See Whitney Chelgren, \textit{Preventive Detention Distorted: Why it is Unconstitutional to Detain Immigrants Without Procedural Protections}, 44 Loy. L.A. L. Rev. 1477, 1515 (2011) (“The Zadvydas decision is significant because it places parameters on the government’s plenary power.”).

\textsuperscript{198} See \textit{Zadvydas v. Davis}, 533 U.S. 678, 695 (2001) (“The Government also looks for support to cases holding that Congress has ‘plenary power’ to create immigration law, and that the Judicial Branch must defer to Executive and Legislative Branch decisionmaking in that area.”).

\textsuperscript{199} Id.

\textsuperscript{200} See \textit{id.} at 690 (“A statute permitting indefinite detention of an alien would raise a serious constitutional problem . . . Freedom from imprisonment—from government custody, detention, or other forms of physical restraint—lies at the heart of the liberty that [the Due Process Clause] protects.”); \textit{see also id.} at 692 (“The serious constitutional problem arising out of a statute that, in these circumstances, permits an indefinite, perhaps permanent, deprivation of human liberty without any such protection is obvious.”).

\textsuperscript{201} See generally \textit{supra} Parts III.B–C, IV.A.

‘Court will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.’” According to the Zadvydas Court, the relevant statute limits detention “to a period reasonably necessary” to secure deportation. As to what constitutes a reasonable amount of time, the Court determined that the statute limits detention to six months. Therefore, after six months in detention, “once the alien provides good reason to believe that there is no significant likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future, the Government must respond with evidence sufficient to rebut that showing.”

C. Demore v. Kim

Hyung Joon Kim, a South Korean citizen, moved to California with his parents in 1984 when he was six years old.

---

204. See id. (“[W]e read an implicit limitation into the statute before us. In our view, the statute, read in light of the Constitution’s demands, limits an alien’s post-removal-period detention to a period reasonably necessary to bring about that alien’s removal from the United States. It does not permit indefinite detention.”).

205. See id. at 701

We do have reason to believe, however, that Congress previously doubted the constitutionality of detention for more than six months. . . . Consequently, for the sake of uniform administration in the federal courts, we recognize that period. After this 6-month period, once the alien provides good reason to believe that there is no significant likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future, the Government must respond with evidence sufficient to rebut that showing. And for detention to remain reasonable, as the period of prior postremoval confinement grows, what counts as the “reasonably foreseeable future” conversely would have to shrink. This 6-month presumption, of course, does not mean that every alien not removed must be released after six months. To the contrary, an alien may be held in confinement until it has been determined that there is no significant likelihood of removal in the reasonably foreseeable future.

206. Id.

Two years later, Kim became a lawful permanent resident of the United States. In 1996, when Kim was eighteen years old, he was arrested and convicted of first-degree burglary. In 1997, Kim was caught and subsequently convicted for shoplifting. Kim pleaded guilty to petty theft with priors, a felony in California. Subsequently, the INS charged Kim with “being deportable from the United States in light of these convictions, and detained him pending his removal hearing.” Kim did not dispute the validity of his prior convictions. Nor did Kim dispute that he was subject to mandatory detention under § 1226(c). Rather, Kim filed a habeas corpus petition challenging the statute’s constitutionality. Kim argued that “a system of mandatory detention without any individualized ‘determination that he posed either a danger to society or a flight risk’ violated the Due Process Clause.”

The Demore Court ultimately upheld the constitutionality of § 1226(c). The Demore outcome surprised many observers because of the Court’s decision just two years prior in Zadvydas. To remedy this apparent contradiction, the Court sought to distinguish § 1226(c) from § 1231, the statute at issue in Zadvydas.\footnote{See Taylor, supra note 41, at 365 (“[T]he Demore Court simply distinguished Zadvydas on its facts, focusing on purported differences in the purpose and length of detention in the pre-hearing and post-order contexts.”).}

The Court distinguished § 1226(c) from § 1231 in two respects. First, the Court compared the purposes of the two statutes.\footnote{See Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 527–28 (2003) (comparing the purposes of §§ 1226(c) and 1231).} The Court noted that in Zadvydas, the statute governed “detention following a final order of removal.”\footnote{Id. at 527.} The Court then explained that because deportation of the petitioners in Zadvydas was “no longer practicably attainable,”\footnote{Id. (quoting Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690 (2001)).} continued detention no longer served the intended statutory purpose.\footnote{See id. (“First, in Zadvydas, the aliens challenging their detention following final orders of deportation were ones for whom removal was ‘no longer practically attainable.’ The Court thus held that the detention there did not serve its purported immigration purpose.” (quoting Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690 (2001)).)} In contrast, the Court asserted that in Demore, “the statutory provision at issue governs detention of deportable criminal aliens pending their removal proceedings.”\footnote{Id. at 527–28.} Accordingly, the Court found that as long as removal proceedings were ongoing, such detention continued to serve the intended statutory purpose.\footnote{See id. at 528 (“Such detention necessarily serves the purpose of preventing deportable criminal aliens from fleeing prior to or during their removal proceedings, thus increasing the chance that, if ordered removed, the aliens will be successfully removed.”).}

Next, the Court compared the length of detention under the two statutes.\footnote{See id. (“While the period of detention at issue in Zadvydas was ‘indefinite’ and ‘potentially permanent,’ the detention here is of a much shorter duration.” (citing Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690–91 (2001))).} The Court found that under § 1231, detention “was ‘indefinite’ and ‘potentially permanent.’”\footnote{See id. (citing Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690–91 (2001)).} In contrast, the Court stated that § 1226(c) posed no such problem because it... contained “a definite termination point”227 and “in the majority of cases it lasts for less than the 90 days . . . considered presumptively valid in Zadvydas.”228 Therefore, the Court partially relied on the temporal, finite nature of detention under § 1226(c) to distinguish it from the statute at issue in Zadvydas.229

Regarding the length of detention under § 1226(c), it has recently come to light that the Demore Court relied on erroneous data from the Department of Justice.230 Newly discovered information obtained through Freedom of Information Act requests show that the Department of Justice “greatly understated the time certain aliens with criminal records spend in no-bail detention.”231 The Demore Court found that “in the majority of cases [detention] lasts for less than the 90 days . . . considered presumptively valid in Zadvydas.”232 However, the recently released data shows that “the average detention period was 382 days, [with a] median of 272 days.”233

Regarding the Demore Court’s use of erroneous data, Solicitor General Ian Gershengorn stated that “[t]he conclusion the court drew is understandable, but it is incorrect.”234

In addition to the controversy surrounding the faulty data relied on in Demore, an unspoken, external factor may have influenced the Court’s surprising effort to distance itself from

---

227. Id. at 529.
228. Id.
229. See id. at 528 (“Zadvydas is materially different from the present case in a second respect as well. While the period of detention at issue in Zadvydas was ‘indefinite’ and ‘potentially permanent,’ the detention here is of a much shorter duration.” (quoting Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 690–91 (2001))).
231. Id.
234. Id.
Zadvydas.235 Scholars posit that the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001 likely played a role in the Court’s decision.236 In the aftermath of the attacks, “the George W. Bush administration profiled and preventatively detained large numbers of Muslim, Middle Eastern, and South Asian men, often by initiating removal proceedings against them.”237 Although Kim was not charged with any terrorism-related offenses, the Court likely recognized that its ruling could interfere with the “[Bush] administration’s ability to detain people without hearings for national security purposes.”238 Therefore, the Court may have strayed from Zadvydas in a deliberate attempt to avoid disrupting the Government’s response to the 9/11 attacks.239

Regardless of the Court’s motive, in a 5–4 decision the Demore Court upheld the constitutionality of § 1226(c) and its mandatory detention regime.240 In doing so, the Court carved

235. See Taylor, supra note 41, at 365 (“But this result was not completely unexpected, for a reason never mentioned within the four corners of the Demore decision.”).

236. See Anello, supra note 40, at 376 (“The Demore majority’s approach differed in significant ways from Zadvydas and its predecessors. The shift in doctrine reflected the political aftermath of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.”); Taylor, supra note 41, at 345 (“It is the historical context of Demore v. Kim, rather than Court’s analysis of precedent, that explains the outcome.”).

237. Anello, supra note 40, at 376; see also id. (“[T]he Court’s emphasis on Congress’s public safety concerns, along with the Bush administration’s use of immigration detention for investigatory or preventative purposes indicates a concern for preserving the administration’s ability to detain people without hearings for national security purposes.”); Taylor, supra note 41, at 365 (“It was decided against the backdrop of the detention of hundreds of Arab and Muslim non-citizens in connection with the 9/11 terrorism investigation, who were taken into INS custody and held without bond until they were cleared by the FBI.”).

238. Anello, supra note 40, at 376; see also Taylor, supra note 41, at 365 (“[B]oth sides knew that the case could affect the government’s claimed authority to detain without bond any non-citizens deemed ‘of interest’ to the terrorism investigation.”).

239. See Taylor, supra note 41, at 365 (“[W]hile the Court studiously avoided commenting on the social and political context of the case, surely the justices saw the connection as well.”).

240. See Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 513 (2003) (“We hold that Congress . . . may require that persons such as respondent be detained for the brief period necessary for their removal proceedings.”); id. at 531 (“For the reasons set forth above, respondent’s claim must fail. Detention during removal proceedings is a constitutionally permissible part of that process.”).
back at the limitations the Zadvydas Court placed on Congress’s plenary power over immigration. 241

Additionally, the Demore Court declined to follow the discussed precedent 242 bifurcating the due process rights of non-citizens first arriving to the United States from those already in the United States. 243 Rather, the Court stated that “Congress may make rules as to aliens that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens.” 244 The Court failed to distinguish between “aliens” arriving to the United States and “aliens” already residing in the country. 245 Accordingly, the Court implied that non-citizens, even lawful permanent residents such as Kim, do not possess the same due process rights as citizens. 246

241. See Taylor, supra note 41, at 363 (“But Demore v. Kim might nevertheless be called a surprising decision, because just two years earlier it had seemed that the Supreme Court was backing away from a strong version of plenary power deference identified with the Cold War era.”); see also id. at 362–63 (“Rather than apply careful due process scrutiny to the statute, the Court instead invoked a ‘fundamental premise of immigration law’—deference to the political branches’ plenary power to control immigration.”).

242. See Denise Gilman, Realizing Liberty: The Use of International Human Rights Law to Realign Immigration Detention in the United States, 36 FORDHAM INT’L L.J. 243, 290–91 (2013) (“It is difficult to see the basis for the Demore decision in specific constitutional precedent. In fact, the decision diverges significantly from the Supreme Court’s decision just two years earlier in Zadvydas.”).

243. See Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 693 (2001) (“The distinction between an alien who has effected an entry into the United States and one who has never entered runs throughout immigration law.”); Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei, 345 U.S. 206, 212 (1953) (“It is true that aliens who have once passed through our gates, even illegally, may be expelled only after proceedings conforming to traditional standards of fairness encompassed in due process of law.”); id. at 213 (“To be sure, a lawful resident alien may not captiously be deprived of his constitutional rights to procedural due process.”).

For further discussion of Mezei and Zadvydas, see supra Parts IV.A–B.

244. Demore, 538 U.S. at 522 (emphasis added).

245. See Medina, supra note 23, at 698 (“Demore treats permanent resident aliens as if they are indistinguishable from unauthorized resident aliens or aliens who are inadmissible to the United States.”).

246. See id. at 697 (“The Court holds that aliens are entitled to a less heightened standard of scrutiny under the Due Process Clause than citizens, even when the governmental action being challenged involves a fundamental human right—the right to physical liberty.”).
As previously mentioned, the Court’s decision was stunning to many, particularly in light of the Zadvydas decision only two years prior. The decision spawned the current circuit split and is critically important because it declared the constitutionality of mandatory, indeterminate detention without bail for non-citizen residents of the United States.

V. Analyzing the Federal Circuit Split

Over the past decade, lower courts have struggled to reconcile Demore and Zadvydas in the context of § 1226(c) detention. However, each circuit to weigh in on § 1226(c) has ultimately followed Zadvydas in two respects. First, the circuits unanimously declined to endorse indeterminate mandatory detention. Second, attempting to avoid addressing

247. See Taylor, * supra* note 41, at 363 (“But Demore v. Kim might nevertheless be called a surprising decision, because just two years earlier it had seemed that the Supreme Court was backing away from a strong version of plenary power deference identified with the Cold War era.”); Anello, * supra* note 40, at 363 (“Such a sweeping, categorical detention is not easily reconciled with the Supreme Court’s 2001 decision in Zadvydas v. Davis, which extended to immigration detention the due process limits that the Court has recognized on other forms of civil detention.”).

249. See, e.g., Michelle Firmacion, Note, Protecting Immigrants From Prolonged Pre-Removal Detention: When “It Depends” is no Longer Reasonable, 42 HASTINGS CONST. L.Q. 601, 608 (2015) (“Lower courts have struggled to reconcile Zadvydas and Demore in the context of pre-removal detention.”); Anello, * supra* note 40, at 363 (“Throughout the past decade, lower courts have sought to reconcile Demore with Zadvydas.”).

250. See, e.g., Anello, * supra* note 40, at 383 (“Since Demore, lower courts have endeavored to implement the Supreme Court’s holding in a way that is most consistent with the due process principles recognized in Zadvydas and its predecessors.”); Taylor, * supra* note 41, at 366 (“Already the lower courts, when asked to reconcile Demore with the rest of due process jurisprudence, have read Demore narrowly while more readily embracing the Zadvydas approach.”).

251. See, e.g., Rodriguez v. Robbins, 715 F.3d 1127, 1137 (9th Cir. 2013) (“While mandatory detention under § 1226(c) is not constitutionally impermissible per se, the statute cannot be read to authorize mandatory detention of criminal aliens with no limit on the duration of imprisonment.”); Ly v. Hansen, 351 F.3d 263, 269 (6th Cir. 2003) (“Zadvydas established that deportable aliens, even those who had already been ordered removed, possess a the statute’s constitutionality, each circuit chose to read an implicit time limitation into § 1226(c).

However, despite the circuits’ unanimous agreement that “section 1226(c) includes some ‘reasonable’ limit on the amount of time that an individual can be detained without a bail hearing, courts remain divided on how to determine reasonableness.” This division among the circuits over “how to determine reasonableness” marks the essence of the current split.

A. Individualized Reviews of Reasonableness

In evaluating “the amount of time that an individual can be detained without a bail hearing,” the First, Third and Sixth Circuits call for individualized reviews to determine whether detention under § 1226(c) has become unreasonable. Under this substantive Fifth Amendment liberty interest, and that interest was violated by indefinite detention.”).

252 See Reid v. Donelan, 819 F.3d 486, 494 (1st Cir. 2016) (“And, each circuit has found it necessary to read an implicit reasonableness requirement into the statute itself, generally based on the doctrine of constitutional avoidance.”); see also Lora v. Shanahan, 804 F.3d 601, 616 (2d Cir. 2015) (“[W]e hold that, in order to avoid the constitutional concerns raised by indefinite detention, an immigrant detained pursuant to section 1226(c) must be afforded a bail hearing before an immigration judge within six months of his or her detention.”); Rodriguez, 715 F.3d at 1138 (“Consistent with our previous decisions, we conclude that, to avoid constitutional concerns, § 1226(c)’s mandatory language must be construed ‘to contain an implicit “reasonable time” limitation, the application of which is subject to federal-court review.’” (quoting Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 682 (2001)); Diop v. ICE/Homeland Sec., 656 F.3d 221, 231 (3d Cir. 2011)

“[I]t is a cardinal principle of statutory interpretation . . . that when an Act of Congress raises a serious doubt as to its constitutionality . . . [courts] will first ascertain whether a construction of the statute is fairly possible by which the question may be avoided.” Applying this principle to 1226(c) we conclude that the statute implicitly authorizes detention for a reasonable amount of time . . . . (quoting Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 689 (2001)).

253 Lora, 804 F.3d at 614.
254 Id.
255 Id.
256 See, e.g., Reid, 819 F.3d at 501 (“Our ruling today, requiring an individualized approach, removes that predicate.”); Diop, 656 F.3d at 232–33 (“At a certain point, continued detention becomes unreasonable . . . . This will rule, “every detainee must file a habeas petition challenging detention, and the district courts must then adjudicate the petition to determine whether the individual’s detention has crossed the ‘reasonableness’ threshold, thus entitling him to a bail hearing.”

In Ly v. Hansen, the district director of the INS appealed a district court ruling granting habeas corpus to Hoang Minh Ly, a lawful permanent resident as of 1987. The INS took Ly into custody on May 11, 1999, and kept him in detention for 500 days before a district court ordered his release.

Upon analyzing the legal landscape relating to § 1226(c), the Sixth Circuit declined to follow the Demore Court’s ruling that § 1226(c) “was not unconstitutional in requiring the detention of deportable aliens pending their deportation.” The Sixth Circuit distinguished Ly from Demore on the ground that, in Demore, “Kim was a deportable alien for whom deportation, to South Korea, was a real possibility.” In contrast, the Sixth Circuit found that Ly’s deportation was never a real possibility.

necessarily be a fact-dependent inquiry that will vary depending on individual circumstances. We decline to establish a universal point at which detention always be considered unreasonable.”); Ly, 351 F.3d at 273 (“We hold that the INS may detain prima facie removable criminal aliens, without bond, for a reasonable period of time . . . . The reasonableness of the length of detention is subject to review by federal courts in habeas proceedings . . . .”).

257. Reid, 819 F.3d at 495 (quoting Lora, 804 F.3d at 614).
258. 351 F.3d 263 (6th Cir. 2003).
259. Id. at 265.
260. See id. at 274 (Haynes, J., dissenting) (“The United States Attorney General granted Ly refugee status when he entered the United States. Ly became a permanent United States resident on December 21, 1987, and has lived in the United States with other family members who are also permanent residents.”).
261. Id. at 265.
262. Id. at 270.
263. Id.
Instead of following Demore, the Sixth Circuit looked to Zadvydas for guidance. On the issue of mandatory detention, the Sixth Circuit observed that Zadvydas did sanction mandatory detention of non-citizens without a bond hearing. However, the Sixth Circuit also agreed with the Zadvydas Court that a statute authorizing indeterminate mandatory detention posed a constitutional problem. Therefore, in accordance with Zadvydas, the Sixth Circuit sought to read a reasonable time limitation on mandatory detention into § 1226(c) to avoid addressing the statute’s constitutionality.

In determining what type of limitation to read into § 1226(c), the Sixth Circuit declined to adopt the bright-line, six-month limitation imposed in Zadvydas. Rather, the Sixth Circuit found that the unpredictable nature of removal proceedings demanded more flexibility than the post-removal detention at agreement . . . with Vietnam that clears the way for Vietnamese immigrants under deportation orders to be sent back to their country”) (on file with the Washington and Lee Law Review).

---

265. Ly, 351 F.3d at 267 (“The question remaining before us is whether the holding of Zadvydas extends to the mandatory pre-removal detention statute . . . .”).

266. See id. at 267–68 (“Zadvydas also made clear that limited civil detention, without bond, is constitutional as applied to deportable aliens.”).

267. See id. at 269 (“Although criminal aliens may be incarcerated pending removal, the time of incarceration is limited by constitutional considerations, and must bear a reasonable relation to removal.”); see also id. at 267

 Congress has ordered that aliens who have been convicted of an aggravated felony or two crimes involving moral turpitude (including fraud) must be detained pending removal proceedings, based on a prima facie determination of removability by the government. If an order of removal is not entered (or not entered promptly), the result is mandatory indefinite detention for criminal aliens, which is prohibited by Zadvydas.

268. See id. at 267 (“Since permanent detention of Permanent Resident Aliens under § 236 would be unconstitutional, we construe the statute to avoid that result, as did the Court in Zadvydas.”); id. at 270 (“By construing the pre-removal detention statute to include an implicit requirement that removal proceedings be concluded within a reasonable time, we avoid the need to mandate the procedural protections that would be required to detain deportable aliens indefinitely.”).

269. See id. at 271 (“A bright-line time limitation, as imposed in Zadvydas, would not be appropriate for the pre-removal period . . . .”).
issue in Zadvydas. Therefore, the Sixth Circuit determined that courts must conduct individualized inquiries into the reasonableness of ongoing detention under § 1226(c). The Sixth Circuit concluded that “[w]hen actual removal is not reasonably foreseeable, deportable aliens may not be indefinitely detained without a government showing of a ‘strong special justification,’ constituting more than a threat to the community, that overbalances the alien’s liberty interest.”

As in Ly, the Third Circuit in Diop v. ICE/Homeland Security acknowledged the constitutional problem with a statute authorizing mandatory, indeterminate detention without a bond hearing. To avoid a constitutional problem, the Third Circuit also cited Zadvydas and sought to read a limitation on mandatory detention into § 1226(c). Additionally, as in Ly, the Third Circuit declined to “establish a universal point at which detention will always be considered unreasonable.” Rather, the Third Circuit stated that reasonableness depends on “whether continued detention is necessary to carry out the statute’s purpose” and that “[r]easonableness, by its very nature, is a fact-dependent inquiry requiring an assessment of all of the 270. See id. (“A bright-line time limitation, as imposed in Zadvydas, would not be appropriate for the pre-removal period; hearing schedules and other proceedings must have leeway for expansion or contraction as the necessities of the case and the immigration judge’s caseload warrant.”).

---

271. See id. (“In the absence of a set period of time, courts must examine the facts of each case, to determine whether there has been unreasonable delay in concluding removal proceedings.”).

272. Id. at 273.

273. 656 F.3d 221 (3d Cir. 2011).

274. See id. at 231 (discussing § 1226(c)’s due process implications).

275. See id.

276. Id. at 233.

277. Id. at 235.
circumstances of any given case." Therefore, "when detention becomes unreasonable, the Due Process Clause demands a hearing, at which the Government bears the burden of proving that continued detention is necessary to fulfill the purposes of the detention statute."

The First Circuit is the latest circuit to weigh in on the current split. In Reid v. Donelan, the Government appealed a district court decision that Mark Anthony Reid's continued detention under § 1226(c) was unreasonable absent a bond hearing. Reid, a lawful permanent resident since 1978 and a U.S. Army veteran, challenged his continued detention after spending eight months in INS custody.

On appeal, the First Circuit noted that "[t]he concept of a categorical, mandatory, and indeterminate detention raises severe constitutional concerns." The First Circuit then determined that, as in Zadvydas, it would "read an implicit reasonableness limitation into the statute to avoid constitutional conflict."

As to what limitation to apply, the First Circuit surveyed the current circuit split and discussed whether to apply individualized reviews as in the Third and Sixth Circuits, or whether to apply a bright-line rule as in the Second and Ninth Circuits.

The First Circuit stated that, on a practical level, it preferred the Second and Ninth Circuits’ bright-line approach. However, the First Circuit provided several reasons why it felt restrained

---

278. Id. at 234.
279. Id. at 233.
280. 819 F.3d 486 (1st Cir. 2016).
281. Id. at 492.
282. Id. at 491.
283. Id. at 494.
284. Id. at 496.
285. See id. at 494–95 ("And, each circuit has found it necessary to read an implicit reasonableness requirement into the statute itself, generally based on the doctrine of constitutional avoidance . . . . Yet, the courts of appeals have split on the method for enforcing this statutory reasonableness requirement.").
286. See id. at 498 ("Despite the practical advantages of the Second and Ninth Circuits’ approach . . . .").
from adopting such a rule. 287 First, as in Ly, the First Circuit stated that Zadvydas' six-month rule simply does not make sense in the context of § 1226(c) detention. 288 Next, the First Circuit viewed Demore as effectively barring its “ability to adopt a firm six-month rule.” 289 Finally, the First Circuit asserted that “the inherent nature of the ‘reasonableness’ inquiry weigh[s] heavily against adopting a six-month presumption of unreasonableness.” 290

Regarding individualized reviews, the First Circuit stated that “[f]rom a more practical standpoint . . . the approach employed by the Third and Sixth Circuits has little to recommend it.” 291 The First Circuit went on to describe several potential pitfalls associated with individualized reviews. 292 However, despite the First Circuit’s preference for a bright-line rule on a practical level, the court felt compelled to adopt the Third and Sixth Circuits’ individualized approach. 293 As a result, the First Circuit

287. See id. at 495 (“From a strictly legal perspective, we think that the Third and Sixth Circuits have the better of the argument.”).

288. See id. at 496 (“Although it is tempting to transplant this [six-month] presumption into § 1226(c) based on the superficial similarities of the problems posed, such a presumption has no place here.”).

289. Id. at 497; see also id. (“In Demore, the Supreme Court declined to state any specific time limit in a case involving a detainee who had already been held for approximately six months . . . . The Demore Court also briefly discussed facts specific to the detainee . . . .”).

290. Id.

291. Id.

292. See id. at 497–98

First, the approach has resulted in wildly inconsistent determinations . . . . Second, the failure to adopt a bright-line rule may have the perverse effect of increasing detention times for those least likely to actually be removed at the conclusion of their proceedings . . . . Third, even courts that have adopted the individualized habeas approach have questioned the federal courts’ “institutional competence” to adjudicate these issues and the consequences of such an interpretation.

293. See id. at 498 (“[W]e have surveyed the legal landscape and consider ourselves duty-bound to follow the trail set out by the Third and Sixth Circuits . . . . In the end, we think the Third and Sixth Circuits’ individualized approach adheres more closely to legal precedent than the extraordinary intervention requested by Petitioner.”).
Circuit joined the Third and Sixth Circuits’ side of the current split.

B. Bright-line, Six-Month Reasonableness Limitation on Detention

In order to avoid addressing the constitutionality of § 1226(c), the Second and Ninth Circuits read a bright-line, six-month reasonableness limit into the statute.\(^{294}\) Under the bright-line rule, a non-citizen detained under § 1226(c) “must be provided a bond hearing once his or her detention reaches the six-month mark, because any categorical and mandatory detention beyond that timeframe is presumptively unreasonable.”\(^{295}\)

In Rodriguez v. Robbins,\(^{296}\) the Ninth Circuit heard an appeal regarding a class of non-citizens who challenged “their prolonged detention . . . without individualized bond hearings and determinations to justify their continued detention.”\(^{297}\) The class members had each been detained for over six months pursuant to either 8 U.S.C. §§ 1225(b)\(^{298}\) or 1226(c)\(^{299}\).

As to § 1226(c), the Ninth Circuit sought to determine whether mandatory detention of non-citizens “for prolonged periods raises the constitutional concerns identified by the Supreme Court in Zadvydas, or whether such detention is consistent with Demore and, thereby, permissible.”\(^{300}\)

---

\(^{294}\) See Lora v. Shanahan, 804 F.3d 601, 616 (2d Cir. 2015) (“[W]e hold that, in order to avoid the constitutional concerns raised by indefinite detention, an immigrant detained pursuant to section 1226(c) must be afforded a bail hearing before an immigration judge within six months of his or her detention.”); Rodriguez v. Robbins, 715 F.3d 1127, 1138 (9th Cir. 2013) (“Therefore, subclass members who have been detained under § 1226(c) for six months are entitled to a bond hearing . . . .”).

\(^{295}\) Reid v. Donelan, 819 F.3d 486, 495 (1st Cir. 2016).

\(^{296}\) 715 F.3d 1127 (9th Cir. 2013).

\(^{297}\) Id. at 1130.

\(^{299}\) See Rodriguez, 715 F.3d at 1131 (“This appeal concerns individuals detained in southern California for six months or longer under one of two federal immigration statutes.”).

\(^{300}\) Id. at 1134.
Ultimately, the Ninth Circuit found that Demore is limited to detentions of brief duration. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit stated that “while mandatory detention under section 1226(c) is not constitutionally impermissible per se, the statute cannot be read to authorize mandatory detention of criminal aliens with no limit on the duration of imprisonment.” Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit, citing Zadvydas, set out to read a “reasonable time limitation” into § 1226(c).

As to what “reasonable time limitation” to read into the statute, the court looked to a prior Ninth Circuit decision for guidance. In Diouf v. Napolitano, the Ninth Circuit addressed the issue of “prolonged” detention under a separate immigration-related statute. In that case, the court ruled that detention exceeding six months constituted “prolonged” detention and required a bond hearing before an immigration judge.

The Rodriguez court acknowledged that detention under § 1226(c) was not at issue in Diouf. Nevertheless, the Rodriguez court decided to read the same six-month limitation into § 1226(c). Therefore, the Ninth Circuit determined that non-citizens “detained under § 1226(c) for six months are entitled to a bond hearing.”

In Lora v. Shanahan, the Second Circuit heard the government’s appeal following an order releasing Alexander Lora on bond pending his removal proceedings. On appeal, the Second Circuit sought to determine, among other issues, whether mandatory, indeterminate detention without a bond hearing violated Lora’s due process rights. The Second Circuit stated that it would read an implicit limitation into § 1226(c) “in order to avoid significant constitutional concerns.” The Second Circuit then provided several reasons justifying applying a bright-line, six-month reasonableness limit to mandatory detention under § 1226(c).

First, the Second Circuit noted that the Zadvydas Court implemented a six-month reasonableness limitation on detention in a related context. Next, the Second Circuit found that a

---

309. See id. (“But Diouf II strongly suggested that immigration detention becomes prolonged at the six-month mark regardless of the authorizing statute.”).

310. Id. at 1138.

311. 804 F.3d 601 (2d Cir. 2015).

312. See infra Part I for more on Alexander Lora and his story.

313. See Lora, 804 F.3d at 605 (“[T]he immigration judge (‘IJ’) ordered Lora’s release conditioned on posting a $5000 bond. This appeal followed.”).

314. See id. at 613 (“Lora also argued below and argues to this Court that his indefinite detention without being afforded a bond hearing would violate his right to due process.”).

315. Id. at 606.

316. See id. at 614–15

We believe that, considering the relevant Supreme Court precedent, the pervasive confusion over what constitutes a “reasonable” length of time that an immigrant can be detained without a bail hearing, the current immigration backlog and the disastrous impact of mandatory detention on the lives of immigrants who are neither a flight risk nor dangerous, the interests at stake in this Circuit are best served by the bright-line approach.

317. See id. at 615 (“In Zadvydas, the Court held that six months was a ‘presumptively reasonable period of detention’ in a related context, namely post-removal-determination detention.” (quoting Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 700–01 (2001))).
bright-line rule would “ensure[] that similarly situated detainees receive similar treatment” and would result in “more certainty and predictability” in its application. Finally, the Second Circuit expressed concern about the effect that individualized determinations of reasonableness, and the uncertainty that comes with it, would have on non-citizens and their families.

Therefore, the Second Circuit upheld mandatory detention under § 1226(c), but stated that “to avoid the constitutional concerns raised by indefinite detention, an immigrant detained pursuant to section 1226(c) must be afforded a bail hearing before an immigration judge within six months of his or her detention.” The Second Circuit concluded that at the bail hearing, “the detainee must be admitted to bail unless the government establishes by clear and convincing evidence that the immigrant poses a risk of flight or a risk of danger to the community.”

VI. Recommendation to Resolve the Circuit Split

At the time of this writing, the circuits remain split three-to-two, with both sides refusing to endorse the Demore Court’s decision, sanctioning mandatory, indeterminate detention of non-citizens under § 1226(c). Instead, to avoid prolonged detention under § 1226(c), the circuits on both sides of the split interpret the statute to include an “implicit reasonable time limitation” on mandatory detention. The First, Third, and

---

318. Id.
319. Id.
320. See id. at 616 (“Finally, without a six-month rule, endless months of detention, often caused by nothing more than bureaucratic backlog, has real-life consequences for immigrants and their families.”).
321. Id.
322. Id. (citing Rodriguez v. Robbins, 715 F.3d 1127, 1131 (9th Cir. 2013)).
323. See, e.g., Rodriguez v. Robbins, 715 F.3d 1127, 1137 (9th Cir. 2013) (“While mandatory detention under § 1226(c) is not constitutionally impermissible per se, the statute cannot be read to authorize mandatory detention of criminal aliens with no limit on the duration of imprisonment.”).
324. Buckman, supra note 71, § 6.5.
325. See Reid v. Donelan, 819 F.3d 486, 494 (1st Cir. 2016) (“And, each
Sixth Circuits call for individualized reviews to determine whether mandatory detention has become unreasonable,\(^\text{326}\) while the Second and Ninth Circuits maintain that mandatory detention becomes presumptively unreasonable after six months.\(^\text{327}\) However, both circuits' approaches, as argued below, fail to provide non-citizen arrestees with adequate due process.\(^\text{328}\) Therefore, neither side's approach constitutes an acceptable resolution to the current circuit split. To resolve the split, the Court should revisit its anomalous \emph{Demore} decision to protect the due process rights of non-citizens in the United States.

A. \emph{Demore}'s Inconsistency with Due Process Jurisprudence

Beginning in 1893, the Court has routinely provided that the Fifth Amendment's due process rights apply to all individuals within the United States, including non-citizens.\(^\text{329}\) Accordingly, in 2001, the Zadvydas Court recognized that Congress’s plenary power “is subject to important constitutional limitations”\(^{330}\) and that “once an alien enters the country, the legal circumstance changes, for the Due Process Clause applies to all ‘persons’ within the United States, including aliens.”\(^{331}\) Yet, just two years later, the Demore Court flatly stated that “th[e] Court has firmly and repeatedly endorsed the proposition that Congress may make rules as to aliens that would be unacceptable if applied to citizens.”\(^{332}\) The Demore Court’s assertion of a ubiquitous dividing line between the rights of citizens and non-citizens represents an archaic view of Congress’s plenary power\(^{333}\) and fractures the otherwise harmonious due process jurisprudence previously mentioned.\(^{334}\)

As discussed above, the Court has repeatedly stated that the Due Process Clause applies to non-citizens in the United States.\(^{335}\) Therefore, if the Court were to revisit Demore, the question should become whether § 1226(c) survives a Fifth Amendment challenge absent judicial deference to a robust concept of plenary power. To answer this question, the Court should look to Fifth Amendment jurisprudence in a context similar to § 1226(c)’s pre-removal detention.

---

\(^{330}\) See Taylor, supra note 41, at 363 (“But Demore v. Kim might nevertheless be called a surprising decision, because just two years earlier it had seemed that the Supreme Court was backing away from a strong version of plenary power deference identified with the Cold War Era.”).

\(^{331}\) See id. at 366 (“The [Demore] decision is inconsistent with Zadvydas and the Salerno line of cases, and thus may be unstable as precedent.”).

\(^{332}\) See McCaslin, supra note 69, at 202 (“As far back as the late nineteenth century, the Supreme Court recognized that aliens within the borders of the United States are ‘persons’ entitled to the protection of the United States Constitution and thereby to the Fifth Amendment’s guarantee of due process.”). For a list of Supreme Court precedent delineating the due process rights of non-citizens in the United States, see supra note 329 and accompanying text.
As to relevant Fifth Amendment jurisprudence, past scholarship and the Demore dissent have referred to the United States v. Salerno line of preventive detention cases when discussing § 1226(c). Of those cases, mandatory detention under § 1226(c) most closely resembles the Bail Reform Act of 1984’s (Bail Reform Act) pretrial preventive detention regime at issue in Salerno. Both § 1226(c) and the Bail Reform Act call for detention prior to a proceeding—whether it be a trial or deportation hearing—to prevent a risk of flight or danger to others. In Salerno, the Court upheld the Bail Reform Act against a Fifth Amendment challenge on the ground that the statute’s “extensive safeguards suffice to repel a facial challenge.” In sum, if resident non-citizens receive the same due process rights as citizens, as argued here, and the Bail Reform Act’s comparable pretrial detention regime withstood a Fifth Amendment challenge in Salerno—a Court revisiting Demore should look to Salerno and the Bail Reform Act to 337. Demore, 538 U.S. at 561 (Souter, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (“In any case, the analytical framework set forth in Salerno, Foucha, Hendricks, Jackson, and other physical confinement cases applies to both, and the two differences the Court relies upon fail to remove Kim’s challenge from the ambit of either the earlier cases or Zadvydas itself.”).

339. See Chelgren, supra note 197, at 1489–90 (“Immigration detention, therefore, is essentially preventive detention—it is not meant to exact a punitive sentence but is an administrative measure designed to help the government keep track of immigrants who might ultimately be ordered removed and to prevent removable immigrants from committing crimes in the interim.”).

340. Compare Demore v. Kim, 538 U.S. 510, 528 (2003) (“Such detention necessarily serves the purpose of preventing deportable criminal aliens from fleeing prior to or during their removal proceedings, thus increasing the chance that, if ordered removed, the aliens will be successfully removed.” (emphasis added)), with Salerno, 481 U.S. at 749 (“The government’s interest in preventing crime by arrestees is both legitimate and compelling.” (emphasis added)).

341. Salerno, 481 U.S. at 752; see also Chelgren, supra note 197, at 1491 (“In upholding pretrial detention, the Court also pointed to the procedural rights afforded to the arrestee; namely, the Bail Reform Act required an adversarial hearing regarding the arrestee’s dangerousness and placed strict time limits on pretrial detention.”).
determine whether § 1226(c) provides non-citizens with sufficient due process.342

B. United States v. Salerno

In Salerno, the leading case on pretrial preventative detention, the Court considered the constitutionality of the Bail Reform Act.343 The Bail Reform Act authorized pretrial detention of individuals charged with committing crimes in certain categories.344 Congress passed the Bail Reform Act to address “the alarming problem of crimes committed by persons on release.”345 Accordingly, the Bail Reform Act sought to prevent “individuals charged with certain crimes”346 from fleeing or posing a danger to others while released on bail.347

342. See Chelgren, supra note 197, at 1492 (“Given the ubiquitous nature of Salerno-type protections in other preventive detention schemes, it is striking that virtually no protections attach to immigration detention.”); id. at 1516 (“Given that due process rights do apply to immigrants, and given that the government does not have unlimited plenary power, the procedural protections identified in Salerno and its progeny should apply in the context of immigration detention.”).

The Act sets out four categories of offenses in which the government may move for detention on the grounds of a defendant’s flight risk or dangerousness: crimes of violence; offenses for which the maximum sentence is life imprisonment or death; certain major drug offenses carrying a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more; and felonies committed after the accused has been convicted of two or more prior federal or state offenses of the above types.
347. See United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 742 (1987) (“By providing for sweeping changes in both the way federal courts consider bail applications and the circumstances under which bail is granted, Congress hoped to ‘give the courts adequate authority to make release decisions that give appropriate recognition to the danger a person may pose to others if released.’” (quoting S. Rep. No. 98-225, at 3 (1983)); see also id. (stating that the Act sanctions pretrial preventative detention where “no condition or combination of conditions will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community, he shall order the detention of the person
In reviewing a Fifth Amendment challenge to the Bail Reform Act, the Salerno Court emphasized the statute’s “extensive procedural safeguards.” First, and most importantly for our discussion, the Bail Reform Act did not require pretrial preventative detention. Rather, the Court noted that “[i]n a full-blown adversary hearing, the Government must convince a neutral decisionmaker by clear and convincing evidence that no conditions of release can reasonably assure the safety of the community or any person.” Additionally, while the Bail Reform Act itself contained no time limit on pretrial detention, the Court found that “pretrial detention [under the Act] is limited by the stringent time limitations of the Speedy Trial Act.” Ultimately, the Salerno Court upheld the Bail Reform Act, providing a useful canvas for the types of procedural safeguards that a statute authorizing preventive detention should possess to survive a Fifth Amendment challenge.

C. Comparing § 1226(c) Under Demore to the Bail Reform Act

A comparison of the Bail Reform Act and § 1226(c) under Demore reveals several notable distinctions. First, as mentioned above, the Bail Reform Act requires individualized determinations as to the necessity of pretrial preventative

---

348. See id. at 752 (“We think these extensive safeguards suffice to repel a facial challenge.”); id. at 742 (“Section 3142(f) provides the arrestee with a number of procedural safeguards.”).

349. Id.

350. Id. at 747. But see id. at 747 n.4 (“We intimate no view as to the point at which detention in a particular case might become excessively prolonged, and therefore punitive, in relation to Congress’ regulatory goal.”).

Acknowledging that the statute presented serious constitutional issues, the Court nonetheless found that due process was satisfied because of several protections embedded in the “no bail” statute. Pretrial detention without bond was subject to stringent time limitations. In addition, the statute provided substantive criteria to limit its application to “the most serious of crimes,” and careful procedures, built around a bond hearing before a judicial officer, to protect criminal defendants against erroneous decisions.
detention.\textsuperscript{352} In contrast, § 1226(c) mandates detention pending removal proceedings with no individualized inquiry into the necessity of such detention.\textsuperscript{353} Additionally, unlike the Bail Reform Act, which is buttressed by the Speedy Trial Act, § 1226(c) under \textit{Demore} provides no limitation as to the amount of time a non-citizen can remain in custody.\textsuperscript{354}

In upholding the Bail Reform Act, the \textit{Salerno} Court stated that the Act’s “extensive safeguards suffice to repel a facial challenge.”\textsuperscript{355} As evidenced above, § 1226(c) under \textit{Demore} lacks the safeguards found in the Bail Reform Act.\textsuperscript{356} Accordingly, a Court revisiting \textit{Demore} should find that § 1226(c) under \textit{Demore} fails to provide sufficient due process compared to the Bail Reform Act. The question then turns to whether the circuit courts’ added safeguards provide non-citizens with sufficient due process compared to the Bail Reform Act.

\textbf{D. Comparing § 1226(c) in the Circuit Courts to the Bail Reform Act}

\begin{itemize}
\item Dr. See \textit{Salerno}, 481 U.S. at 750 (“In a full-blown adversary hearing, the Government must convince a neutral decisionmaker by clear and convincing evidence that no conditions of release can reasonably assure the safety of the community or any person.”).
\item Dr. See Silva, supra note 73, at 254 (“Section 1226(c) does not entitle the noncitizen to any process weighing the traditional bail factors, including his risk of flight and ties to the community.”).
\item Dr. See Medina, supra note 23, at 700 (“The statutory provisions concerning removal and mandatory detention do not specify the period of time in which removal must be determined nor do they provide a specific limit to the period of time within which an alien placed in removal proceedings must be detained.”).
\item Dr. United States v. \textit{Salerno}, 481 U.S. 739, 752 (1987).
\item Dr. See, e.g., Taylor, supra note 41, at 364 (“The detention scheme [at issue in \textit{Demore}], which mandates pre-hearing detention for virtually all non-citizen offenders without \textit{any} hearing to assess flight risk or dangerousness, indisputably does not meet the criteria of the \textit{Salerno} line of cases.”); Chelgren, supra note 197, at 1491 (“In nonimmigration contexts, the Supreme Court continues to uphold the use of preventive detention when \textit{Salerno}-type protections are present; however, when these protections are absent, the Court holds that preventive detention is unconstitutional.”); Medina, supra note 23, at 737 (stating that \textit{Demore} “is \textit{Salerno} without the \textit{Salerno} process, and it is the distinction between citizens and non-citizens that appears to allow the government to dispense with process”).
\end{itemize}
The federal circuit courts, acknowledging that a straightforward application of § 1226(c) would pose a Fifth Amendment problem, unanimously reject Demore as precedent.\textsuperscript{357} Instead, the circuits on both sides of the split opt to “read Demore narrowly while more readily embracing the Zadvydas approach [of constitutional avoidance].”\textsuperscript{358}

To address § 1226(c)’s failure to provide a time limit on mandatory detention, the circuits on both sides of the split applied the constitutional avoidance doctrine, reading § 1226(c) to include an implicit limit “on the amount of time that an individual can be detained without a bail hearing.”\textsuperscript{359} However, unlike the Bail Reform Act, the circuits on both sides of the split still interpret § 1226(c) to authorize mandatory detention for all covered individuals, albeit with an implicit time limit on such detention read into the statute.\textsuperscript{360} In enacting both § 1226(c) and the Bail Reform Act, Congress expressed a belief that, in certain circumstances, detaining individuals not yet deemed guilty or deportable was nevertheless necessary to achieve a desired objective. However, the Bail Reform Act requires that the Government prove, in an adversary hearing, that detaining an individual prior to trial would actually achieve the desired governmental interest.\textsuperscript{361} In denying arrestees that initial hearing to challenge the necessity of their pre-removal detention,

\begin{flushright}
\footnotesize
\textsuperscript{357} See supra note 251 and accompanying text (providing examples of circuit courts’ explanations for declining to follow Demore).
\textsuperscript{358} Taylor, supra note 41, at 366.
\textsuperscript{359} Lora v. Shanahan, 804 F.3d 601, 614 (2d Cir. 2015); see also Anello, supra note 40, at 363 (stating that “circuit courts have avoided a constitutional problem with the mandatory detention statute by construing its ambiguous language to impose temporal limits on mandatory detention”).
\textsuperscript{360} See, e.g., Lora, 804 F.3d at 616 (“[W]e hold that, in order to avoid the constitutional concerns raised by indefinite detention, an immigrant detained pursuant to section 1226(c) must be afforded a bail hearing before an immigration judge within six months of his or her detention.”); Diop v. ICE/Homeland Sec., 656 F.3d 221, 231 (3d Cir. 2011) (“Applying this principle to 1226(c) we conclude that the statute implicitly authorizes detention for a reasonable amount of time . . . .”). See supra Part V for a discussion of each circuits’ interpretation of § 1226(c).
\textsuperscript{361} Supra notes 348–349 and accompanying text.
\end{flushright}
the circuits’ approaches lack a critical procedural safeguard contained in the Bail Reform Act.\textsuperscript{362}

Additionally, while reading an implicit time limit on detention addressed the issue of indeterminate mandatory detention, § 1226(c) under both sides of the split still authorizes potentially lengthy mandatory detention. Under the individualized review of reasonableness approach, a non-citizen’s only chance for release is to file a habeas petition challenging detention as unreasonable and hope that a district court agrees.\textsuperscript{363} Further, provided a non-citizen detained under § 1226(c) has the means to file such a petition, as the First Circuit observed in \textit{Reid}, individualized determinations tend to produce “wildly inconsistent” results.\textsuperscript{364} Therefore, regardless of how unreasonable detention may appear, timely release in the First, Third, and Sixth Circuits is no sure thing.

To the bright-line, six-month approach, as Lora’s story demonstrates, six months of detention can turn someone’s life upside down. Lora’s 2013 detention lasted only five and a half months, but during that time he lost his job, his son, and his emotional wellbeing.\textsuperscript{365} Lora and his loved ones suffered greatly as a result of his 2013 detention, despite the fact that the Government agreed at his bond hearing that he “was not dangerous and posed no risk of flight.”\textsuperscript{366} Critically, Lora and his loved ones would find themselves in the exact same predicament under the Second and Ninth Circuits’ six-month approach.

\textsuperscript{362} See Gilman, \textit{supra} note 242, at 286 (“[I]n \textit{Salerno}, the Supreme Court emphasized that pretrial detention decisions must be made on an individualized basis and that the government bears the burden of proving the need for detention ‘by clear and convincing evidence.’” (quoting \textit{Salerno}, 481 U.S. at 750–51)).

\textsuperscript{363} See, \textit{e.g.}, Reid v. Donelan, 819 F.3d 486, 495 (1st Cir. 2016) (“Under this approach, every detainee must file a habeas petition challenging detention, and the district courts must then adjudicate the petition to determine whether the individual’s detention has crossed the ‘reasonableness’ threshold, thus entitling him to a bail hearing.” (quoting \textit{Lora}, 804 F.3d at 614)); Ly v. Hansen, 351 F.3d 263, 273 (6th Cir. 2003) (“The reasonableness of the length of detention is subject to review by federal courts in habeas proceedings, as stated by \textit{Zadvydas}.”).

\textsuperscript{364} \textit{Reid}, 819 F.3d at 497.

\textsuperscript{365} See \textit{supra} Part I for more of Alexander Lora’s story.

\textsuperscript{366} \textit{Lora}, 804 F.3d at 605.
Applying the constitutional avoidance doctrine to § 1226(c), the circuits on both sides of the split read an implicit protection against indeterminate mandatory detention into the statute.\(^{367}\) However, both of the circuits’ approaches continue to sanction mandatory detention of resident non-citizens with no individualized inquiry into the necessity of such detention.\(^{368}\) Consequently, the circuits’ approaches reflect the notion that some due process for non-citizens is better than none. However, Supreme Court precedent provides that non-citizens within the United States are entitled to all, not some, of the due process rights set forth in the Fifth Amendment.\(^{369}\) For the foregoing reasons, choosing a side in the current circuit split is not an appropriate resolution. Rather, for the sake of consistency with due process jurisprudence, and for the sake of non-citizens like Lora, the Supreme Court should step in and revisit Demore.

\section*{E. The Road to Resolution}

On June 20, 2016, the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Rodriguez v. Robbins, the Ninth Circuit case involved in the current split.\(^{370}\) This case provides the Court with a prime opportunity to revisit Demore and the constitutionality of § 1226(c). As argued above, the Court should conclude that § 1226(c) under Demore fails to provide sufficient due process compared to the Bail Reform Act. Additionally, the Court should find that the circuits’ implicit time limits on detention fail to fully resolve the disconnect between § 1226(c) and the safeguards contained in the Bail Reform Act. Because neither Demore’s nor the circuits’ interpretations of § 1226(c) provide sufficient due process when compared to the Bail Reform Act, the Court should find that § 1226(c) has a Fifth Amendment problem. If the Court

\begin{itemize}
\item \(^{367}\) Supra note 359 and accompanying text.
\item \(^{368}\) Supra note 360 and accompanying text.
\item \(^{369}\) See supra note 329 and accompanying text (listing Supreme Court precedent delineating the due process rights of non-citizens).
\end{itemize}
deems § 1226(c) unconstitutional, then Congress should amend the statute to include the sort of procedural safeguards found in the Bail Reform Act. \textsuperscript{371} Such a scenario would resolve the current split, as the amended § 1226(c) would presumably contain sufficient due process for non-citizen arrestees. Therefore, the statute’s Fifth Amendment problem that created the present circuit split would no longer exist.

Regarding the practice of overturning precedent, the Supreme Court generally adheres to the doctrine of stare decisis.\textsuperscript{372} However, the Court regularly acknowledges that the doctrine “is not an inexorable command.”\textsuperscript{373} Rather, whether the doctrine “shall be followed or departed from is a question entirely with the discretion of the court.”\textsuperscript{374} Accordingly, the doctrine of stare decisis is not determinative if the Court wishes to overrule \textit{Demore}.

\textbf{VII. Conclusion}

Lora’s story serves as a sobering reminder that § 1226(c) does not apply only to non-citizens who illegally entered the country weeks or months before detention. The statute applies to all non-citizens, including Lora, who entered the United States legally at the age of seven and lived in Brooklyn ever since.\textsuperscript{375} The Court, and the country, should not be satisfied with the circuits’ interpretations of § 1226(c), as both approaches continue to deny \textsuperscript{371} See \textit{supra} Part VI.B for a description of the procedural safeguards identified in \textit{Salerno}.

\textsuperscript{373} \textit{Payne v. Tennessee}, 501 U.S. 808, 828 (1991); see also \textit{Smith v. Allwright}, 321 U.S. 649, 665 (1944) (“\textit{W}hen convinced of former error, this Court has never felt constrained to follow precedent.”).

\textsuperscript{374} See \textit{Hertz v. Woodman}, 218 U.S. 205, 212 (1910) (“The rule of \textit{stare decisis}, though one tending to consistency and uniformity of decision, is not inflexible. Whether it shall be followed or departed from is a question entirely within the discretion of the court, which is again called upon to consider a question once decided.”).

\textsuperscript{375} \textit{Id.} at 606.
non-citizens, like Lora, the same due process as citizens receive under the Bail Reform Act.

This Note proposes that the Supreme Court revisit its anomalous Demore decision. In doing so, the Court should overturn Demore and strike down § 1226(c) as unconstitutional. Such an outcome would resolve the current circuit split and remove the inconsistent application of § 1226(c) in the circuits. Additionally, such a result would provide a benefit to United States citizens because the costs of detaining non-citizens pending removal proceedings would decrease if mandatory detention were not required for all. Finally, and most importantly, such a ruling would ensure that non-citizens, like Alexander Lora, may never have to suffer unreasonably and unnecessarily.