ENDURING EQUITY IN THE CLOSE CORPORATION

LYMAN JOHNSON*

TOUT DOIT CHANGER POUR QUE RIEN NE CHANGE¹

INTRODUCTION

Much has changed since the summer of 1976—famously, the nation’s Bicentennial, but also the date of Wilkes v. Springside Nursing Home, Inc.,² the focus of this Symposium. In mid-2010, for example, South Africa was the site of a peaceful if exuberant World Cup Soccer tournament,³ whereas in mid-1976, South African police opened fire on crowds protesting the government’s harrowing apartheid policies.⁴ Unemployment stood at 7.7% in 1976⁵—higher than usual, but not the August 2010, stubborn rate of 9.7%.⁶ The

1. This French saying means “Everything must change so that nothing changes.” This ironic historical maxim likely came from the French translation of the 1958 novel THE LEOPARD by Giuseppe Di Lampedusa in which the character Tancredito declares, “[s]i nous voulons que tout resta tel que c’est, il faut que tout change.” GIUSEPPE DI LAMPEDUSA, THE LEOPARD (Feltrinelli 1958). It is less well-known than the phrase “Plus ça change, plus c’est la même chose” (“The more things change, the more they stay the same.”). ALPHONSE KARR, LES GUÉPES (1849). As argued in this Article, it is equity’s remarkable adaptability that makes it so durable and well-suited to preserve within the corporation—under constantly changing circumstances—the ongoing pursuit of a just ordering. This commemorative reflection on Wilkes will develop this theme of change/sameness in connection with equity—the source of the fiduciary duties which stood, as they often do in close corporations, as the centerpiece in Wilkes. Equity's role in the Western legal tradition began, of course, long before Wilkes, and it endures today in the law of close corporations precisely because, ironically, it is so adaptable. Parts I, II, and III will sketch the larger milieu of the Wilkes case, where details about place, industry, and company are rich in their historic particulars but where too endless change is at work in the perennial quest for survival. Part I describes the city, Pittsfield, Massachusetts where the focal point of litigation—Springside Nursing Home, Inc. (Springside)—was located. Part II tells a bit about the key industry in the case, nursing homes, from the early 1950s to the mid-1970s—the period spanning the company's origins to the Supreme Court decision in Wilkes. Part III highlights a few noteworthy, but little noted, facts about Springside itself. Part IV hones in on the dispute between Stanley Wilkes and his fellow shareholders in Wilkes v. Springside Nursing Home, Inc., and on how the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, in resolving that dispute, re-fashioned the equitable concerns animating the landmark *Donahue v. Rodd Electrotype Company*³⁸ decision. Part IV also places the Wilkes decision in a broader legal context—where it is seen as no aberration—and elaborates on how and why, in 2011, equity endures, by taking account of the inevitable flux in business relations in a way which static law does not. Equity endures even as it continually eludes law’s attempted subduing by rules, with the result that equity itself must still be endured by those involved in close corporations.

I. THE PLACE

Springside, a corporation formed under Massachusetts law, was located in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, the county seat of Berkshire County.³⁹ Named after William Pitt, today the city’s population of 42,642 is down from the 51,974 of the 1980 census, and it is about back to where it stood in 1920.⁴⁰ Due to the many streams flowing into the nearby Housatonic River, numerous lumber, paper, and textile mills dotted the landscape around Pittsfield, and for a significant part of the 19th century, that “area [was] the center of woolen manufacturing in the United States.”⁴¹ Today, those industries are gone, and although Pittsfield’s economy still has some manufacturing enterprises,⁴² far more people are employed in education and health services, leisure and hospitality, and in the public sector.⁴³ The city also has been a place of residence for several famous writers, including Herman Melville, who wrote Moby Dick while living in Pittsfield;⁴⁴ Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Edith Wharton, and Oliver Wendell Holmes, whose family had vast landholdings in Pittsfield and whose son, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., served on the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts for two decades before becoming a Justice on the U.S. Supreme Court in 1902.⁴⁵

Like the path-breaking legal duo of Donahue and Wilkes, Pittsfield itself is associated with several “firsts.” William Craig was the first Secret Service agent killed on a presidential protection detail as he accompanied President Theodore Roosevelt on a trip to Pittsfield.⁴⁶ Mr. Craig was thrown to the street when the barouche carrying President Roosevelt collided head-on with a trolley.⁴⁷ Roosevelt’s face was badly bruised, and ever the pugilist, he nearly came to blows with the trolley’s motorman, who later pled guilty to manslaughter.⁴⁸ The first electric transformer was produced in Pittsfield by William Stanley, whose Electric Manufacturing Company was a forerunner to General Electric.⁴⁹ In the first ever inter-collegiate baseball game—held in Pittsfield in 1859 and played under the more wide-open, but soon-abandoned, “Massachusetts rules”—Amherst defeated Williams in twenty-five innings and by the astounding score of 73-32.⁵⁰ In addition, Colonel John Brown of Pittsfield, was, during the Revolutionary War, the first to accuse Benedict Arnold of treachery;⁵¹ Pittsfield resident William Allen wrote An American Biographical and Historical Dictionary and was President of Dartmouth at the time of the famous Supreme Court case;⁵² and department store magnate Marshall Field took his first paying job as an “errand boy” in Pittsfield.⁵³

With its stolid but interesting history, Pittsfield was an apt setting for what surely started out as just another prosaic lawsuit, involving a typical business dispute, which went on, nonetheless, to generate considerable, if niched, notoriety. Unlike Pittsfield’s other encounters with famous firsts,⁵⁴ the Wilkes ruling in 1976⁵⁵ may have gone unnoticed by, and may be still largely unknown to, the local populace—the case drew no comment in the Berkshire Eagle newspaper, much less the August *Boston Globe*⁵⁶—even though its enduring influence may be far greater than those “firsts” elsewhere touted by Pittsfield’s boosters.

II. THE INDUSTRY

The four original partner-shareholders in Springside showed remarkable entrepreneurial vision, or enjoyed extremely good fortune, in entering the nursing home business in the early 1950s. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court opinion spends little time on this, observing only that, with respect to a certain real estate parcel, “the parties later determined that the property would have its greatest potential for profit if it were operated by them as a nursing home.”⁵⁷ We see change in the parties’ thinking, it is obvious, from the very outset.

The post-World War II period was a time of considerable growth in the nursing home business.⁵⁸ This resulted from, among other factors, shifting cultural attitudes about proper care for the elderly and increased availability of federal payments for construction of nursing homes “in conjunction with existing facilities,” which were approved in the 1954 Medical Facilities Survey and Construction Act in an effort to improve the overall quality of elder care.⁵⁹ Passage of the Kerr-Mills Provisions in 1960, moreover, authorized medical assistance payments to poorer residents of nursing homes,⁶⁰ though many states did not participate in that voluntary program.⁶¹ Still, the real growth lay ahead, given that of all money appropriated by Congress for construction of various facilities in 1954, only $4 million was allotted for nursing homes.⁶²

The real growth in the nursing home industry occurred in the 1960s.⁶³ Due to the availability of Medicare and Medicaid payments to nursing homes beginning in the mid-1960s, by the mid-1970s the nursing home industry had experienced a dramatic upsurge, with overall nursing home expenditures increasing 1,400% between 1960 and 1974.⁶⁴ President Gerald Ford, in May 1976, even called for the observance of National Nursing Home Week.⁶⁵ Sixteen thousand homes were generating $4.7 billion in annual revenue by the mid-70s.⁶⁶ Three-quarters of the private nursing homes in the mid-1970s were operated on a for-profit basis, with approximately two-thirds of total industry revenue coming from government sources.⁶⁷ Moreover, by the mid-1970s, much of the industry was organized with the same separation between ownership and management as seen in other businesses,⁶⁸ as larger care-providers increasingly were drawn to the attractive profit opportunities the industry offered.⁶⁹ It was also during this high-growth period, however, and notwithstanding extensive regulation, that the nursing home industry was famously associated with chilling tales of patient neglect and abuse, corruption, and rampant Medicaid fraud.⁷⁰ It should be emphasized, however, that nothing in the Wilkes opinion suggests that the Springside Nursing Home was afflicted with these problems.

The industry was quite capital intensive, not because of large expenditures for capital equipment, but due to extensive investment in improved real estate.⁷¹ This investment was encouraged by government reimbursement formulas, which included a percentage return on invested capital.⁷² For example, a 1976 study of the nursing home industry drawing on data obtained from public company reports filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission, reveals that due to large depreciation charges affording tax shelters, a typical nursing home bed yielded an enviable 29% rate of cash flow return on investment.⁷³

Mr. Wilkes, with a judicially-noticed reputation for profitable dealings in real estate,⁷⁴ would have clearly understood depreciation charges, tax shelters, and cash flow. Financially, the nursing home business generated a steady, government-provided revenue stream; government-sanctioned depreciation charges; and high, dependable cash flow returns, all in a stable growth industry.⁷⁵ For any shareholder to abruptly lose a longstanding stream of income from any corporation is a financial setback. For a real estate and cash-flow-savvy investor like Wilkes, it altered fundamentally the very raison d'être for investing in a nursing home company like Springside in the first place.

III. THE CORPORATION

In 1951, Mr. Wilkes acquired an option to purchase a lot and building on the corner of Springside Avenue and North Street in Pittsfield.⁷⁶ The property had previously housed the Hillcrest Hospital.⁷⁷ Mr. Wilkes was said to be “principally engaged in the roofing and siding business” but he also had a local reputation for “profitable dealings in real estate.”⁷⁸ To be accurate, Mr. Wilkes had started his roofing business in 1939, when he was thirty-three years old, and in 1972, when he was sixty-six, he sold it and went into the siding business.⁷⁹ He was forty-five when he bought the Springside Avenue option in 1951.⁸⁰ Wilkes brought in three other investors—Riche, Quinn, and Pipkin—and the four of them initially purchased the building and lot “as a real estate investment which, they believed, had good profit potential on resale or rental.”⁸¹ Initially, Wilkes may have seen this as yet another opportunity for his “profitable dealings in real estate.”⁸²

Later the four men decided “the property would have its greatest potential for profit . . . as a nursing home.”⁸³ Whether visionary or simply fortunate, in retrospect this was a wise move, given how rapidly the nursing home industry grew in the 1950s and, especially, in the 1960s.⁸⁴ The decision to operate a nursing home on the lot the four gentlemen acquired must have happened fairly quickly because a Berkshire Eagle newspaper article reports that Springside opened its first nursing home in October 1951,⁸⁵ the same year the property was purchased.⁸⁶ Springside opened a second home in late 1952 and a third home in February of 1957, when it bought and renovated property previously owned by the Pittsfield Anti-Tuberculosis Association.⁸⁷ The third home had especially impressive and up-to-date fire-alarm, sprinkler, and back-up power systems.⁸⁸ Once the third home had opened, the company reportedly was the largest privately-owned nursing home operator in Massachusetts.⁸⁹

corporation rather than a partnership, largely to avoid personal liability for business debts.⁹⁰ The other three investors concurred.⁹¹ It appears, however, that the business was operated for at least some period as a partnership prior to being incorporated, a fact that would shape Wilkes's initial legal strategy.⁹² This background fact in Wilkes certainly confirms the observation made a year earlier in Donahue that many close corporations are, essentially, "little more than incorporated . . . partnerships."⁹³

The newly formed Massachusetts corporation, Springside Nursing Home, Inc., owned and operated all aspects of the nursing home business, and each of the four men became a twenty-five percent shareholder.⁹⁴ The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court opinion emphasized that certain original "understandings" existed among the parties,⁹⁵ but, apparently, Wilkes's attorney did not advocate a written shareholders' agreement to protect his client or any of the other shareholders.⁹⁶ Consequently, the parties evidently relied on these spoken but unmemorialized understandings. This may reveal poor legal counsel, or client naïveté, but it also indicates a certain level of trust; this trust was understandable on Wilkes's part given that all three co-investors already were known to him at the time of the investment and were described by the court as his acquaintances.⁹⁷ This background fact likewise confirms the insightful observation in Donahue that, in close corporations, the participants necessarily "rely on the fidelity and abilities of those stockholders who hold office."⁹⁸

The mutual understandings of the participants in Wilkes were straightforward and quite typical of those arising from a close corporation. Each shareholder would be a director, would actively participate in management and decision-making concerning company operations, and "each would [, in turn,] receive money from the corporation in equal amounts."⁹⁹ No federal income tax "S" election, permitting avoidance of tax at the corporate level, was in effect. Thus, salaries reduced corporate income subject to taxation.

Wilkes, also by understanding, served as treasurer of the business from 1951 until 1967.¹⁰⁰ And so it went, as planned and understood, for many years. By 1955, only the fourth full year of operation, each shareholder was receiving $100 per week, amounting to $5,200 per year.¹⁰¹ The median income for men in the United States in 1955 was only $3,400 per year.¹⁰² And only 23.7% of all men earned over $5,000 per year.¹⁰³ Consequently, payments received from the corporation alone—excluding all other sources of income—placed each Springside shareholder in the top quartile of all male wage earners in 1955.

Moreover, it should be recalled that Wilkes was “principally engaged” in the roofing business.¹⁰⁴ Thus, his non-primary business activity—the nursing home business—was providing him at age forty-nine with annual income more than 50% above the median level of income for all men in 1955. For some unexplained reason, the weekly payouts did not increase over the next twelve years but remained at $100 per week in 1967, the year trouble broke out.¹⁰⁵ Even in 1967, however, the mean income for all men was only about $8,100.¹⁰⁶ Moreover, for people between the ages of 55 and 64—Wilkes was 61 in 1967—the median income was only around $7,000.¹⁰⁷ Thus, Wilkes’s non-primary business activity—the nursing home business—still was providing a very handsome financial return, on a relative basis, even though roofing was his chief occupation, and even though corporate payouts had not increased for many years. Furthermore, assuming the business was flourishing—and certainly the period from the mid-1950s through the 1960s was a profitable time for the nursing home industry generally—given the flat annual payout ratio and bright industry prospects with new Medicare and Medicaid payments, the value of the stock itself must have been appreciating considerably.

It was Wilkes’s announcement in early 1967 of his intention to sell his stock that brought to the surface some simmering bad blood,¹⁰⁸ and afforded the other investors an opportune way to put the “squeeze” on Wilkes.¹⁰⁹

The falling out among shareholders is well if tersely described in the Wilkes opinion.¹¹⁰ The upshot was that, just as Wilkes in early 1967 sought to exit and “cash out” of Springside after sixteen years, he was cut off by the other three director-investors from all salary payments and was removed as an employee, officer, and director.¹¹¹ The discord had its origins in Wilkes’s insistence in 1965 that co-shareholder Quinn pay a higher price for certain Springside property Quinn wished to purchase for himself.¹¹² Wilkes’s fidelity to the corporation apparently annoyed Quinn and led to a deterioration in their relationship.¹¹³ Eventually, two intra-corporate factions formed: Wilkes versus the other three investors.¹¹⁴ There were no allegations or findings of misconduct, neglect, or unwillingness to work on Wilkes’s part.¹¹⁵ Wilkes, a minority shareholder, was being “frozen out” of the venture he initiated, a venture designed—like his early real estate dealings and like all investments in the nursing home industry—to generate high, dependable cash flow.¹¹⁶ In fact, the manner of freezing out Wilkes was far more in line with the typical corporate freeze-out than the unequal purchase and sale of stock technique deployed in Donahue,¹¹⁷ oppressive as that technique was. This was important in situating the Wilkes facts well within the ambit of customary concern in close corporations, a concern that was so expansively—perhaps too expansively—identified in Donahue.¹¹⁸ years later.¹¹⁹ In the author's experience, this delay is not uncommon, as a disgruntled shareholder often tries and expects (or hopes) to reach an acceptable resolution before suing. Moreover, it is only when the shareholder has been "cut off" for two or more years that one can truly conclude he has experienced a "pattern" of being shut out of corporate distributions.

Wilkes engaged an out-of-town lawyer, James F. Egan, from Springfield, who later engaged another Springfield lawyer David J. Martel (Wilkes's nephew), to assist in the appeal to the Supreme Judicial Court.¹²⁰ He filed a "bill in equity" in Probate Court for Berkshire County and named as defendants the corporation itself, two of his fellow shareholders, and the executors of the deceased third shareholder.¹²¹ His initial theory for relief was breach of a 1951 oral partnership agreement.¹²² Relying on a master's report—which essentially found what Wilkes had alleged—the probate judge nonetheless dismissed the case in 1974,¹²³ the year before the seminal Donahue decision.¹²⁴ Interestingly, the Supreme Judicial Court granted direct appellate review of the Wilkes dismissal in late 1974,¹²⁵ just before the Donahue decision itself, which was issued on May 2, 1975.¹²⁶ Thus, as it deliberated over the Wilkes case, the court had Donahue fresh in its mind. It seems unlikely that a direct appeal would be granted if the court saw the case as involving only a breach of partnership agreement, the theory below. Justice Wilkins's very terse concurrence in Donahue was remarkably prescient in light of the Wilkes appeal because he refrained from joining in any implication in the majority opinion that the court's reasoning "applies to all operations of the corporation as they affect minority stockholders. That broader issue, which is apt to arise in connection with salaries and dividend policy, is not involved in this case. The analogy to partnerships may not be a complete one.”¹²⁷ It was more than “apt” to arise; it had already arisen, and would soon be before the court, in the Wilkes appeal. Sense can be made of this concurrence when one sees that, for some reason, Justice Wilkins did not subsequently participate in the Wilkes opinion—although he was still on the court—and thus his concurrence in Donahue apparently was his only opportunity to express at least some misgivings about how to resolve the upcoming Wilkes appeal in light of Donahue.

Having taken the Wilkes appeal in October 1974, the court did not rule until August 1976,¹²⁸ suggesting the court was struggling to craft its ruling. Donahue was also slow to be decided, taking fourteen months after the ruling in the appeals court.¹²⁹ Moreover, on appeal, and in light of the fact that Donahue had been decided since Wilkes had taken his appeal, Wilkes added a claim for breach of fiduciary duty owed him by the majority shareholders.¹³⁰ The court permitted the additional theory, a deviation from standard appellate practice, but understandable in light of the intervening and momentous decision in Donahue.¹³¹ The court—now led by a new Chief Justice (Hennessey), former Chief Justice Tauro having retired after *Donahue*¹³²—made short shrift of Justice Wilkins’s hesitancy in his Donahue concurrence to automatically apply partnership law analogies in all close corporation settings.¹³³ The court concluded that it was not vital to its decision whether Wilkes’s claim was governed by partnership law or corporate law because Donahue had held that shareholders in close corporations owe one another substantially the same duties partners owe each other.¹³⁴ The Wilkes court, in other words, was not carving back the Donahue partnership analogy—the court described the factual differences between the two cases as “more of form than of substance”¹³⁵—though it did, as is well-known, reconfigure Donahue in another key fashion described below.

Wilkes, because he had never been “principally” employed by Springside,¹³⁶ was not the typical shareholder-employee who, in being terminated as an employee, loses his chief source of wage income. Thus, the court could not, with respect to Wilkes, over-emphasize the “job guarantee” or employment aspect of a minority shareholder’s investment in a close corporation.¹³⁷ Instead, the court, besides mentioning Wilkes’s loss of “participation in the management of the enterprise,”¹³⁸ shrewdly and neutrally phrased a longstanding salary payment to Wilkes as being “the principal return on his investment” and its curtailment as denying Wilkes “an equal return on his investment.”¹³⁹ That perceptively hit the financial nail on the head for Wilkes himself, specifically, as an inveterate real estate investor and for investors generally in the nursing home industry, where, as noted earlier, regular cash flow is a chief investment goal.¹⁴⁰

The larger human narrative in the Wilkes opinion was one of betrayal and dashed expectations among longtime colleagues. This theme played out in the usual way in a close corporation after “bad blood” between Wilkes and Quinn grew into majority and minority factionalism.¹⁴¹ Although none of the parties is fully sketched in the opinion, Wilkes is fleshed out in somewhat fuller humanity than are the defendants.¹⁴² As to the defendants, relatively little is said, with more attention given to their role as—controlling shareholders—in the morality play of corporate dissension and the specific actions they took in that role.¹⁴³ Even in that archetypal capacity, neither the defendants nor the court had much to say in their defense.

In keeping with the tenor of the times, the Wilkes opinion was doctrinal, though it drew heavily on scholarship detailing the plight of a minority shareholder.¹⁴⁴ There was no evident “law and economics” influence on the opinion—landmark works in that vein by Guido Calabresi and Richard Posner were very recent¹⁴⁵—and corporate law itself was several years away from being systematically examined from an economics perspective.¹⁴⁶ The opinion also was not empirical or multidisciplinary in orientation.

The enduring and memorable heart of Wilkes, of course, is the way in which it sought to rein in a potentially over-broad reading of Donahue’s imposition of partnership-like fiduciary duties on controlling shareholders. The court stressed the need for a “balanced” approach to the legitimate control rights of the majority, on the one hand, with the rightful concerns of the minority, on the other hand.¹⁴⁷ Balancing, of course, is a longstanding mainstay of constitutional law analysis, where competing interests are weighed against each other and the relative strengths of each are assessed.¹⁴⁸ Its use can be seen, for example, in dormant commerce clause analysis,¹⁴⁹ due process review,¹⁵⁰ outlining abortion rights,¹⁵¹ and in evaluating (and upholding) a law criminalizing the distribution of child pornography.¹⁵² All of these knotty issues—and others like them—require courts to measure the rival interests and determine which, on balance, carries the greater weight. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court itself had used a balancing approach in constitutional law cases before Wilkes.¹⁵³ Thus, as a decision-making methodology, the Wilkes approach was drawing on deep and established precedent.

Wilkes's balancing approach was fitting, but paradoxical. In constitutional law the pivotal issue in balancing is how to reconcile individual rights with governmental interests, the latter typically being embodied in legislatively-enacted, majority-supported statutes.¹⁵⁴ Indeed, the first ten amendments to the U.S. Constitution—the Bill of Rights—and their subsequent incorporation via the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, are designed to protect individual interests against the lawfully-exercised power of a political majority.¹⁵⁵ The Donahue opinion, by analogy, struck a protective “bill of rights” blow for minority interests in close corporations gave little heed to the rightful claims of the majority interests acting in accordance with the corporate statute’s “constitutional” power structure.¹⁵⁶ Wilkes sought to restore the potential imbalance of Donahue by acknowledging the “selfish ownership” rights of the controlling group.¹⁵⁷ Rather than the usual constitutional law concern for the individual in relation to the potentially tyrannical majority, therefore, Wilkes set forth a “reverse bill of rights” to recognize the legitimate concerns and prerogatives of the duly-constituted majority.

Such a case-by-case balancing approach inevitably is messy, context specific, and often lacking in ex ante predictability.¹⁵⁸ In the constitutional law area, balancing has been severely criticized for just these reasons, as well as for the broad discretion it accords judges.¹⁵⁹ Consequently, in the governance of a close corporation, as in a constitutionally-democratic government, frequently there arises an unavoidable and recurrent clash. This clash is not just between minority expectations and majority prerogatives, but also over views as to how best, jurisprudentially, to address that clash. Some favor the case-by-case approach, notwithstanding its messy, time-consuming, and somewhat indeterminate nature, on the grounds that it promotes more finely-tailored overall fairness.¹⁶⁰ Others prefer a more categorical approach in which, in corporations at least, minority shareholders must self-help ex ante by private bargaining or are left out in the cold when trouble erupts, because such an approach promotes greater certainty of outcome and somewhat disempowers the judiciary.¹⁶¹ This clash of positions presents a stark antinomy in which a true harmonization of views is, ultimately, impossible to attain.

Of course the jurisprudential vessel for “unsettling” corporate law and its statutorily-enacted majoritarian regime is equity. Equity—and its offspring, fiduciary duties¹⁶²—by their very nature subvert and destabilize law.¹⁶³ The problem with legal precepts, identified so clearly by Aristotle, is their universality.¹⁶⁴ Although generally the categorical nature of law is desirable, so that evenhandedness is attained, in some settings to apply a legal rule blindly will itself create a manifest injustice and it is equity’s essential function to prevent that.¹⁶⁵ Delaware’s corporate jurisprudence long has recognized this role in numerous settings.¹⁶⁶ For example, with respect to the improper use of statutory power to amend bylaws to thwart a minority shareholder in the landmark case of Schnell v. Chris Craft Industries, Inc., the Delaware Supreme Court stated that “inequitable action does not become permissible simply because it is legally possible.”¹⁶⁷ And Delaware courts also have held that otherwise lawful corporate contracts are invalid if entering them constitutes a breach of fiduciary duty.¹⁶⁸ In other words, equity, in certain circumstances, routinely intervenes into law-complying arrangements to correct injustice by imposing fiduciary duties on a control person or group and by constraining an inequitable exercise of power. Although equity usefully meliorates the potential unfairness of law’s categorical rules in this way, it can, nonetheless, seem disturbingly amorphous with no clearly-delineated limits. This was one of the post-Donahue concerns that required attention in Wilkes.

The perennial temptation, of course, is for law, initially hobbled by equity, to counteract equity’s foray by turning its very interventions back into more orderly “rules of law.” Aristotle cautioned against this understandable but faulty desire for an illusory certainty by stating: “The rule of the undefined must itself remain undefined also.”¹⁶⁹ Along this line, Wilkes valiantly tried to corral somewhat the equitable forces unleashed in Donahue through Donahue’s broad holding that shareholders in a close corporation owe one another a strict fiduciary duty of utmost good faith and loyalty.¹⁷⁰ At the same time that Donahue articulated this broad duty, it went on in utter tension therewith to mandate a “rule of equal opportunity,”¹⁷¹ apparently not appreciating the inherent differences and functions between “standards” and “rules.”¹⁷²

Wilkes sought to cabin the broad duty laid out in Donahue—without also reverting to the trap of “rule talk”—through a structured four-step framework.¹⁷³ First, the plaintiff minority-shareholder has an initial burden to plead a breach of fiduciary duty.¹⁷⁴ Second, the defendant control group then must demonstrate a legitimate business purpose.¹⁷⁵ Third, the plaintiff must prove that the same objective could have been achieved by an alternative course less harmful to the minority.¹⁷⁶ Finally, taking a balancing approach, the court weighs the strengths of the two sides and settles the dispute.¹⁷⁷ This methodology seeks to bring order to the analytical and adjudicative process, but in the age-old law vs. equity tug of war it cannot—nor does it seek to—ultimately subdue the ever-unruly equity by crafting universal “rules” of law. In keeping with that approach, at the end of its opinion, the Wilkes court summed up that Mr. Wilkes—who, recall, had brought his suit as a bill in equity—was to be awarded such damages as a result of the “inequitable enrichment” of the majority.¹⁷⁸

The ongoing, but futile, Sisyphus-like effort in corporate law to counter the disruptive effects of equity by turning equity into the very rule-oriented approach it is designed to resist can be seen not just in Donahue but in other areas of corporate law. For example, self-dealing transactions by directors or controlling shareholders long have been closely scrutinized by courts.¹⁷⁹ In an effort to bring a measure of legal predictability to these transactions, many states—including Massachusetts and Delaware—have enacted statutes addressing director conflict of interest transactions.¹⁸⁰ Yet, these statutes, in Delaware at least,¹⁸¹ and seemingly in Massachusetts as well,¹⁸² have been interpreted as permitting avoidance of a transaction’s voidability but not as preventing a court from reviewing the matter ex post for compliance with fiduciary duties. Equity will not altogether quit the field here.

Even the seemingly awkward multi-step framework laid out in Wilkes has considerable company in corporate law.¹⁸³ The aim, recall, is to guide the equitable inquiry without vainly trying to reduce it to rule-like status.¹⁸⁴ Such a methodology is not too dissimilar, for example, to Delaware's approach in demand-excused derivative litigation.¹⁸⁵ There, after a plaintiff-shareholder begins an action for breach of fiduciary duty, defendants may establish an independent committee to investigate, and, if the committee members conclude the action is not in the company's best interests, they may move to dismiss.¹⁸⁶ However, the defendants must carry the burden on certain issues, such as the committee's independence and good faith.¹⁸⁷ If they carry that burden, the court itself may weigh various factors and exercise its own judgment whether to dismiss the case or proceed to trial.¹⁸⁸

Also, in Cede & Co. v. Technicolor, Inc., the Delaware Supreme Court likewise devised a framework of shifting burdens in fiduciary duty litigation.¹⁸⁹ Beginning with a presumption of propriety in director actions, the plaintiff-shareholder assumes the initial burden of providing evidence of a breach of duty, which, if proven, shifts to the director-defendants the burden of proving, to the court's satisfaction, the entire fairness of director conduct.¹⁹⁰ And in the shareholder voting context, if the board acts in a way that thwarts a shareholder vote, neither the deferential business judgment rule nor a rule of per se invalidity is appropriate, but rather the defendants have the burden to provide a "compelling" corporate justification for the actions taken.¹⁹¹

The Wilkes court mandated as one step in its framework that the controlling shareholders must "demonstrate a legitimate business purpose" for its action—a burden they failed to carry in that case.¹⁹² This step likewise situates the case in a larger stream of decisional law designed to guide and constrain judicial review. "Business purpose," for example, has long been required in the corporate tax area,¹⁹³ in the hostile takeover defensive measures area,¹⁹⁴ and in other cases where the court seeks to prohibit the majority from unilaterally “freezing out” minority shareholders.¹⁹⁵

These examples of multi-step frameworks and of requiring the business purpose element demonstrate the efforts of Delaware and other courts to do in a parallel way what the Wilkes court did: affirm the centrality of strict fiduciary duties among shareholders in a close corporation while bringing a principled sense of order and guidance to the law and equity tension so as to prevent one from vanquishing the other, while also avoiding the corresponding Donahue misbelief that the two forces had somehow been harmonized into an easy-to-apply “rule.” Concerns about Donahue led the Supreme Court of Delaware to reject it by reading it as just such a “rule-based” decision—without noting the subsequent tempering of Wilkes—which Delaware eschewed in favor of its customary “entire fairness” test in a self-dealing context like that in Donahue.¹⁹⁶ Yet, in Wilkes itself, the Delaware approach would not have worked because the controlling shareholders did not themselves enter a self-dealing transaction with the company for which the “entire fairness” test was designed.¹⁹⁷ Rather, the controlling shareholders caused the company to terminate the minority shareholder’s prior arrangement with the business. Delaware’s more traditional doctrinal approach seems not to capture such behavior. And the Supreme Judicial Court itself, in subsequent cases, has struggled to reconcile the broad fiduciary duty of Donahue with the employment-at-will doctrine in an effort to curb a corporate law incursion into the labor law area.¹⁹⁸ No rule exists to make this accommodation easy.

Law and equity will continue to subsist in an uneasy tension in our corporate legal system because each plays a vital role in the production of a healthy balance in that system.¹⁹⁹ Indeed, there is a great irony thirty-five years after the Wilkes decision and its Dona- hue-like drawing on partnership law to bolster fiduciary duties in the close corporation. Today, in partnerships—and also in LLCs, entities unknown in 1976—fiduciary duties supposedly may be contractually eliminated altogether,²⁰⁰ while in corporations that is forbidden.²⁰¹ Thus, while in 1975-76 Donahue and Wilkes creatively drew on partnership law to amplify the equitable voice in close corporations, thirty-five years later that voice, although still remaining in the corporation, may, by contract, now be silenced altogether in Delaware partnerships and LLCs.²⁰² In the initially more robust and protective non-corporate fiduciary duty area, law today in the leading business law state seeks to subdue equity, whereas in the close corporation arena law and equity remain, as always, at wary play. In Massachusetts, by contrast, thirty-five years after Wilkes a greater harmony between corporate and non-corporate business enterprises still endures.²⁰³

CONCLUSION

Much has changed since 1976. The city of Pittsfield, Massachusetts has changed as it continues to adapt economically to a far different industrial-commercial environment than that in which it flourished for many years. The nursing home industry continues to change as well, with the use of physical and chemical restraints—permitted in the mid-70s—now outlawed and the development of new procedures to ensure greater regulatory compliance.²⁰⁴ Spring-side Nursing Home, Inc. also has changed—apparently it was dissolved long ago. Yet, one of its former properties endures as a 39-unit housing complex for homeless veterans,²⁰⁵ just as Springside Nursing Home itself had earlier converted a former tuberculosis treatment center into a nursing home.²⁰⁶ Adaptation has occurred, for survival sake, in many venues associated with the Wilkes case.

Fiduciary duties in the close corporation are an example of enduring equity. Shareholders in close corporations must “endure” equity in the sense that they must put up with it and, generally, cannot expel it a priori by means of statutes and private contracts. Equity in the close corporation also “endures” in the sense that it persists. It persists because in many instances—Donahue and Wilkes being examples—it is needed to prevent lawfully-exercised power from unjustly harming a minority shareholder. One key feature in its staying power, besides its usefulness, is its remarkable adaptability to the flux and “gray” of—and range of emotions affecting—human relations within a business. It opportunely takes account of time—and its passage—in a way timeless legal rules do not. Law assumes both a highly rational world and one in which, while everything around it may change, a rule itself—once adopted—will be the same tomorrow as it was yesterday, no matter what else—even if much else—may have changed.²⁰⁷ In Donahue, hoary partnership law was equitably re-fashioned to the close corporation setting and history was made. In Wilkes, the very force unleashed in Donahue was itself molded yet again to give greater weight to the law-conferred privilege of control. Wilkes tethered equity and law together in a multi-step framework without purporting to elegantly and forever solve the intractable law-equity quandary. The decision itself has endured. It has been cited countless times,²⁰⁸ appears in leading corporate law casebooks²⁰⁹ usually as a coda to Donahue—and probably is taught (or at least touched on) in most American law school corporations courses.²¹⁰

Equity's unruly power to upend can be irksome to those who crave predictability and determinacy. It remains essential, however, in a rules-based system where humility demands we admit that few rules are so sagely written that they will always avoid injustice if categorically applied. Equity usefully permits the taking of a second look, and, therefore, by nature it is more pliant and fluid than rigid precepts of law. Equity's very capacity to bring change means that nothing need change in our legal system's ongoing pursuit of a just ordering within the close corporation.
