Privatizing Family Law in the Name of Religion

Robin Fretwell Wilson
Washington and Lee University School of Law, wilsonrf@wlu.edu

Recommended Citation
Robin Fretwell Wilson, Privatizing Family Law in the Name of Religion, 18 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 925 (2010).

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarlycommons.law.wlu.edu/wlufac
Part of the Family Law Commons
PRIVATIZING FAMILY LAW IN THE NAME OF RELIGION

Robin Fretwell Wilson*

In pockets across the world, a movement has quietly taken hold to allow fundamentalist religious norms, rather than state law, to govern family matters like divorce and inheritance. Many of these religious norms depart significantly from the state’s background rules protecting individuals. Nonetheless, fundamentalist religious understandings are given the force of law, either by treating them as binding judgments arrived at through arbitration or by delegating jurisdiction to religious groups to decide family disputes, with nominal state oversight.

This Essay explores the risks to two traditionally vulnerable groups, women and children, when the state delegates its traditional oversight of the family to religious authorities. To surface these risks, this Essay draws on two lived experiences of religious deference around the world. Specifically, this Essay examines the eighty-five

* Class of 1958 Law Alumni Professor of Law, Washington and Lee University School of Law. Thanks for thoughtful advice and critique to Kent Greenawalt, Edward Henneman, Gordon Hylton, Lash LaRue, and the participants in the William and Mary Institute of Bill of Rights Law’s Symposium on Families, Fundamentalism, & the First Amendment, the International Society of Family Law’s panel on The Interface of Family Law and Religion, the Southeastern Association of Law Schools’ panel on Abolishing Marriage, and the Faculty Workshop Series at the University of Illinois College of Law. This Essay draws on Robin Fretwell Wilson, The Perils of Privatized Marriage, in MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE IN A MULTICULTURAL CONTEXT: RECONSIDERING THE BOUNDARIES OF CIVIL LAW AND RELIGION (Joel A. Nichols ed., forthcoming 2010). I am especially indebted to Anna Katherine Moody for all of her diligent and tireless research.

1 As used in this Essay, the terms “fundamentalist” or “conservative” generally refer to specific sects of Christian, Islamic, and other belief groups identified as such by the social scientists who have studied them. See, e.g., infra note 67 and accompanying text (discussing conservative Christian groups).

2 This Essay addresses only the application of religious norms to family law matters. It does not argue against deference to all religious understandings. Society should accommodate individual religious beliefs in a range of contexts, from the wearing of beards by Muslim prisoners to the respecting of holy days in employment. See, e.g., 1 KENT GREENAWALT, RELIGION AND THE CONSTITUTION: FREE EXERCISE AND FAIRNESS chs. 9, 10 & 13 (2006); Robin Fretwell Wilson, Matters of Conscience: Lessons for Same-Sex Marriage from the Healthcare Context, in SAME-SEX MARRIAGE AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY: EMERGING CONFLICTS (Douglas Laycock, Anthony R. Picarello, Jr. & Robin Fretwell Wilson eds., 2008) (arguing for religious exemptions to same-sex marriage laws where no hardship results for same-sex couples). By embracing multiple faiths, society combats xenophobia, refuses to segment into “us” and “them,” and accords respect to deeply held beliefs. See GREENAWALT, supra, at 3–9 (discussing various values that lie behind the Constitution’s religion clauses). Much of this accommodation of individuals costs society very little. But when it comes to family matters, society has a stake in the outcome of a family’s affairs. This Essay explores society’s interests in family affairs involving women and children.
Sharia courts operating in Great Britain today, which apply Islamic, not British, law to divorce and inheritance.³ It also examines the system of shared jurisdiction in Western Thrace, a section of Greece where three Mufti decide family disputes for a Muslim minority of 110,000 people.⁴ While this Essay spotlights experiments to enforce Islamic rather than civil understandings of family matters, numerous scholars have advocated for deference to the religious understandings of Christian, Jewish, and other faith groups as well.⁵

In both places, the civil law supplanted by fundamentalist religious norms would provide considerably more protection to individuals in two periods of great need, upon divorce and the death of a spouse. As this Essay documents, these protections for the vulnerable are hollowed out when harsh religious understandings displace the state’s more protective rules, whether in fundamentalist Islamic families or fundamentalist families of other faiths. Drawing on systems of deference operating today, Part I shows how women at divorce stand to lose custody of adolescent children and face near certain poverty if certain schools of Islamic law govern the proceeding. Part II assesses how a woman’s ability to exit a marital relationship, especially a violent one, may be affected by religious deference. This Part argues that religious deference-undercuts the state’s ability to police family violence. Part III then shows that upon a spouse’s death, women face equally grave and devastating results under Islamic law. The wealth a woman would otherwise receive upon her husband’s death under civil law shrivels under Islamic law to a mere fraction of the decedent’s estate, leaving many women financially at risk. Part IV rejects two articulated justifications for schemes of religious deference despite the inequitable treatment of women—namely, that a woman’s natal family will support her financially when the husband does not and that women have voluntarily accepted these outcomes. Policymakers considering schemes of deference in their own countries should consider these inequities before giving effect to extreme religious views that will trap some women in poverty or abusive relationships.⁶

⁴ Irini Lagani, Greece’s Muslim Minority in Western Thrace, 3 BRIEFING NOTES ON ISLAM SOC’Y & POL. 8 (2000).

⁶ See Wilson, supra note 5 (manuscript at 10 n.27), for a description of academic proposals urging greater religious deference and for a description of Canada’s brief flirtation with, then rejection of, religious arbitration (noting that any arbitration in Canada by religious bodies must now apply Canadian, not religious law).
I. LIVED EXPERIENCES OF RELIGIOUS DEFERENCE

Two systems of religious deference operating today provide a snapshot of the risks to women and children in such systems. These lived experiences in Great Britain and Western Thrace demonstrate poignantly that removing state protections from the family is fraught with peril.

A. Great Britain’s Embrace of “Islamic” Divorce

In 2008, the British government “quietly sanctioned the powers for sharia judges to rule on cases ranging from divorce and financial disputes to those involving domestic violence.” This system of religious arbitration took root despite a firestorm of controversy that erupted in early 2008 when the Archbishop of Canterbury called for a “plural jurisdiction” in which Muslims could choose to resolve family disputes in religious tribunals or in British courts. The Bishop of Rochester predicted that “[i]t would be impossible to introduce a tradition like Sharia into [the] corpus [of British law] without fundamentally affecting its integrity.”

Lawmakers also reacted with alarm. Nick Clegg, Britain’s Liberal Democrat leader, stated that “[e]quality before the law is part of the glue that binds our society together. We cannot have a situation where there is one law for one person and different laws for another.” A spokesperson for the Prime Minister proclaimed that “British law should apply in this country, based on British values.”

Despite the controversy, eighty-five Sharia courts now operate in Great Britain, serving a Muslim population of more than 1.5 million people. These Islamic tribunals capitalize on the experience of Jewish Beth Din courts that have resolved civil cases for Orthodox Jews in Great Britain “for more than 100 years.” Under Great Britain’s Arbitration Act, the judgments are civilly enforced provided both parties agreed to binding arbitration.

---

10 Id.
12 See Doughty, supra note 3.
14 See Taher, supra note 7.
15 See Arbitration Act, 1996, c. 23, § 58 (Eng.).
The overwhelming majority of Great Britain’s Muslim population is Sunni (ninety-six percent).\(^\text{16}\) Judging by the affiliations of Britain’s mosques,\(^\text{17}\) most subscribe to the Hanafi school, one of the four Sunni schools of law and one of Islam’s seven schools.\(^\text{18}\)

The substantive rules applied in Sharia courts depart significantly from British law, with significant consequences for women. In some Sunni schools, there is a “strong presumption . . . that the husband will get custody of the children in the event of a divorce,”\(^\text{19}\) as Figure 1 shows.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Islamic Custody Rules</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Sunni School of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hanafi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shafii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maliki</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hanbali</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Figure 1\(^\text{20}\)

\(^\text{17}\) A majority of British mosques are controlled by a Hanafi sect, the Deobandis. DENIS MACEOIN, SHARIA LAW OR 'ONE LAW FOR ALL'? 30 (2009).

These schools differ in their approach to some substantive questions. See Mohammad H. Fadel, Political Liberalism, Islamic Family Law and Family Law Pluralism: Lessons from New York on Family Law Arbitration, in MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE IN A MULTICULTURAL CONTEXT supra note 5, at 4–5, 29, available at http://ssrn.com/abstract=1421978 (noting that “Muslims have their own profound disagreements on the nature of marriage” and describing among the four Sunni schools “material differences in their substantive legal doctrines”); Figure 1.

Of particular concern is what occurs when the Hanafi norm for custody governs. For male and female children over the age of seven and nine, respectively, a father receives custody upon divorce. By contrast, under British laws, custody of children after divorce would be determined by the child’s best interests. Although it is true that in the Hanbali and Shafi’i schools, women do not necessarily jeopardize custody of their children by divorcing, the Hanafi school is the “most widespread and widely applied in modern Shari’a-based legislation.”

Imagine the Catch-22 that will result for some women when Hanafi custody rules govern at divorce. Consider what would happen if a father harshly disciplines his adolescent son, discipline that might constitute child abuse outside that religious community. A mother would be powerless to help her child if the Sharia court enforces the Hanafi religious norm as to custody. If she stays, her son will be beaten, and if she exits, her son remains in her husband’s care.

Even if custody rules do not dissuade particular women from divorcing, Islamic rules governing a couple’s finances after divorce may trap women in non-functioning marriages. As Figure 2 notes, a woman who ends the marriage sometimes has to buy her way out by paying back the mahr—a payment received by her for marrying—or by forfeiting the right to any deferred mahr that would otherwise be due.

---

21 See Alison Diduck & Felicity Kaganas, Family Law, Gender and the State: Text, Cases and Materials 312 (2d ed. 2006). In the United States, the law of child custody has undergone a “dramatic transformation over the past 150 years” beginning “with a powerful presumption for custody with fathers,” which was “then turned on its head over the course of the nineteenth century” to favor mothers and finally to “recenter[ ] on a formally gender-neutral inquiry into the ‘best interest of the child.’” David D. Meyer, The Constitutional Rights of Non-Custodial Parents, 34 Hofstra L. Rev. 1461, 1467–68 (2006) (citing Martha Albertson Fineman, Fatherhood, Feminism and Family Law, 32 McGeorge L. Rev. 1031, 1038 (2001)).

22 Uhlman, supra note 18, § 3.1.

23 See infra Part II.A.

24 It is not clear that the woman even would be permitted to divorce if Islamic law applied, absent a substantial payment to her husband. See infra note 46 and accompanying text.

25 Aspasia Tsaoussi & Eleni Zervogianni, Multiculturalism and Family Law: The Case of Greek Muslims, in European Challenges in Contemporary Family Law 209, 216–17 (Katharina Boele-Woelki & Tone Sverdrup eds., 2008). Many Islamic schools follow this rule. See Nasir, supra note 20, at 122 (noting that “marriage may be dissolved by mutual consent by the wife giving the husband something for her freedom,” which is known as khula, mubaraat, or ransom, but that the husband’s unilateral right of divorce, the talaq ala mal, “does not deprive the wife of her rights under the marriage contract, e.g. deferred dower and maintenance”); M. Hashim Kamali, Islamic Law: Personal Law, in Encyclopedia of Religion 4705, 4708 (Lindsay Jones ed., 2d ed. 2005) (noting that the wife may “secure[ ] her release from the marital tie by offering the husband financial consideration, commonly the return of the dower”); Mosa Sayed, The Muslim Dower (Mahr) in Europe—with Special Reference to Sweden, in European Challenges in Contemporary Family Law, supra, at 187, 198 (citing an Egyptian law allowing a woman to bypass the husband’s unilateral right of divorce but requiring that she return the mahr).
Islamic Understandings of Divorce

- No maintenance after iddat period (roughly 3 months)
- No equitable distribution of property
- In absence of man’s fault, woman pays her way out of marriage

Figure 2

A woman receives no equitable distribution of the property acquired by the couple during the marriage, which is usually titled in the man’s name.26 The Qur’an limits the husband’s duty to provide maintenance, or alimony, to the iddat period, which ends mere months after the divorce.27 All in all, the prospect of certain poverty may tether a woman to a marriage as surely as losing her children would.

By contrast, under British law, a woman receives considerably more protection. There is no question that she would be entitled to divorce.28 She would be entitled to equitable division of the couple’s assets.29 She may even qualify for alimony if she is unable to provide for her own support.30 Thus, by deferring to religious understandings of custody or financial consequences after divorce, society increases the cost to women who seek a divorce. This is especially problematic when a woman wants to divorce for her own safety or the safety of her children.31

Muslim women also face unique procedural hurdles when divorcing. Women need corroboration of their claims in a divorce while men do not.32 Women pay more to file for divorce, £250 versus £100 for men.33 Unless the husband agrees, a woman needs the imam’s permission to divorce and generally needs to show the husband’s fault.34

---

26 See Nasir, supra note 20, at 81 (“It is the duty of the husband to provide and the right of the wife to have a suitable matrimonial home according to the Quranic verse: ‘Lodge them where ye dwell, according to your wealth, and harass them not so as to straiten life for them.’ The wife should follow the husband to the matrimonial home, provided that it complies with the Sharia requirements, that is, that it should be in accordance with the husband’s financial standing . . . .” (quoting Surat Talaq 65:6)).

27 Id. at 148, 152–54 (citing to Surat Baqara 2:228, stating that the iddat lasts for “three monthly courses,” but noting that individual countries have required additional compensation—mutat—in cases of arbitrary repudiation of the wife to mitigate the rule’s harshness); see also David Pearl & Werner Menski, Muslim Family Law 182–84 (3d ed. 1998).

29 See id. at 596–99.

30 See id. at 605.

31 See infra Part II.

33 Id.

34 See Nasir, supra note 20, at 128 (describing Syrian law, derived from the Hanafi school, requiring divorce arbiters to “award a divorce and order the full dower or a commensurate part
For an example of the difficulties faced by women in Great Britain’s Sharia courts, consider the experience of a woman identified in the Daily Mail as “Ameena.”\(^{35}\) Ameena sought assistance from the Islamic Sharia Council to divorce her husband. Backed by testimony of her daughter and two women’s shelter workers, Ameena told the imam, Dr. Hasan, that her husband “beats me and the children.”\(^{36}\) The imam documented the abuse including beating that caused a miscarriage.\(^{37}\) Although Ameena corroborated her claims of abuse, the imam referred Ameena’s case to a council of seven imams.\(^{38}\) The council decided Ameena’s husband should be given another opportunity to reconcile with her before they would grant Ameena a divorce, if the council did so at all.\(^{39}\) As of July 2009, “Ameena’s fate remain[ed] in limbo.”\(^{40}\)

B. Shared Jurisdiction in Western Thrace

Systems of shared jurisdiction may also result in raw deals for women. One example of shared jurisdiction operates in Western Thrace, where the Hanafi school also predominates.\(^{41}\) As a result of the Treaty of Lausanne, signed by Turkey and Greece in 1923, Muslims in Greece enjoy unique independence from the Greek government.\(^{42}\) They maintain their own religious and legal institutions, headed by three Muftis who “conduct all matters related to civil law” using Sharia law,\(^{43}\) specifically Hanafi law.\(^{44}\)

Hanafi law departs significantly from Greek civil law in a number of important areas.\(^{45}\) A recent study of divorce within Western Thrace explains: “[U]nder Islamic law the wife must compensate her husband for the termination of the marriage . . . by returning the dower (mahr) . . . [and] by waiving her right to alimony or even her right to the custody of the children. If the husband does not agree to the divorce, the wife can terminate the marriage only for important reasons pertaining to fault of the husband. While the Greek Muftis have accepted such fault-based reasons as a husband’s violence, “the Mufti[s] often reject[ ] divorce applications filed by women, who thus remain trapped in non-functioning marriages.”

Although there is a technical possibility of divorce through Greek courts, almost no one disputes the authority of the Mufti. Even when a party likely faces an unfavorable outcome or is the weaker party, “the vast majority of cases are brought before the Mufti.”

On the rare occasion that someone disputes a Mufti’s decision, Greek courts routinely find the Mufti’s decision enforceable. Greek civil courts denied enforceability in less than one-half of one percent of cases. This is not surprising since civil review of the Muftis’ judgments is limited to “whether the Mufti remained within his field of competence and whether the law applied contravenes the [Greek] Constitution.”

A number of problems follow from this lack of review. There is no recourse from the Mufti’s judgment, nor is there any guarantee that like cases will be treated alike. As the next Part explains, these harsh rules exacerbate a woman’s ability to exit a marriage in cases of violence in the family.

---

46 Id. at 216–17. Though academics who advocate for greater religious deference in family matters would draw the line at respecting religious understandings about custody because of the state’s paramount interest in protecting children, see Robin Fretwell Wilson, The Overlooked Costs of Religious Deference, 64 WASH. & LEE L. REV. 1363 (2007), this is not the practice in Western Thrace.

47 See NASIR, supra note 20, at 128 (“If the injury, or most of it, is on the part of the husband, the arbiters, having failed to reconcile the spouses, shall award an irrevocable divorce.”).

48 Tsaoussi & Zervogianni, supra note 25, at 217.

49 Id. at 221.

50 Id. at 219–20 (stating that civil courts “denied enforceability in only 11 cases out of 2,679”).

51 Id. at 214.

52 See id. at 221.

53 In some countries, such as Egypt, Islamic courts have at times rejected rigid applications of Sharia law. See Clark B. Lombardi & Nathan J. Brown, Do Constitutions Requiring Adherence to Shari’a Threaten Human Rights? How Egypt’s Constitutional Court Reconciles Islamic Law with the Liberal Rule of Law, 21 AM. U. INT’L L. REV. 379, 423, 425 (2006) (noting that “[i]n dicta, the SCC [Egyptian Supreme Court] has argued that Islamic law is, for constitutional purposes, a source of general moral principles that must be interpreted anew in every day and age and must take evolving notions of human welfare into account” and that in a number of cases, the SCC has upheld “as ‘Islamic’ legislation that requires husbands to pay alimony, legislation that provides women with a right to retroactive child support and legislation that provides Egyptian women with the right to dissolve their marriage for ‘harm’ if their husband takes a second wife” (internal citations omitted)). Yet even these more “liberal”
II. THE COLLISION OF RELIGIOUS NORMS WITH FAMILY VIOLENCE

A growing body of research\(^{54}\) shows that family violence occurs in religious communities, like it does throughout society. When it occurs in religious communities, the victims often receive little or no support for exiting the marriage from religious leaders and other members. This Part captions select social scientific studies of each phenomenon, drawing on empirical studies of Islamic and fundamentalist Christian communities.\(^{55}\) Studies of other faith groups, such as Orthodox Jewish groups, show similar patterns.\(^{56}\)

A. Family Violence in Fundamentalist Religious Households

Studies of domestic violence risk factors find that religion is weakly protective of adherents from violence.\(^{57}\) Nonetheless, religious observers across a number of belief systems are not free of family violence. For instance, Dr. Muhammad Haj-Yahia studied 291 married Arab women in Israel, the majority of whom were Muslim.\(^{58}\) In that study, “[81%] of the participants knew of women who had experienced verbal and psychological abuse by their husbands; [while] 78% knew of Arab women who had experienced ‘moderate physical violence’ (slapping, pulling hair or clothes, pushing).”\(^{59}\) Nearly two-thirds of those surveyed, sixty-four percent, knew Arab women who had... experienced “severe physical violence,” defined as “hard pushing at frequent intervals, attacking the wife and throwing her body against the wall, or attacking the wife with a hard object such as a chair, belt, or stick.”

At least some Muslim enclaves in the United States have cultural norms accepting of domestic violence. A 1999 study by two researchers, Kulwicki and Miller, examined views of Arab American immigrants in the United States, nearly all of whom were Muslim. The researchers asked women and men when it would be appropriate for husbands to slap their wives. Women, shown in black in Figure 3, were more accepting of this practice than men, shown in gray, in a number of different circumstances. These circumstances ranged from when a wife disrespects her husband in the home when no one else is around, the second set of bars in Figure 3, to when

---

60 Id.
61 Kulwicki & Miller, supra note 54, at 207 tbl.1 (reporting that 97.51% of survey respondents were Muslim).
62 Id. at 209 tbl.3.
63 See id. (showing that 34.8% of female and 33.3% of male respondents would approve of a man slapping his wife if she insults him when they are at home alone).
the husband discovers that his wife is cheating, the last set of bars in Figure 3.\textsuperscript{64} Perhaps most alarming, 18.2\% of women in the study said they would approve of a husband killing his wife if he discovered adultery,\textsuperscript{65} as the black arrow shows.

Men share these views as well. In another study, nearly a quarter, and sometimes nearly two-thirds of the male respondents, justified wife beating because of “sexual infidelity, insulting the husband in front of his friends, challenging [his] manhood, disobeying the husband,” and a variety of other reasons.\textsuperscript{66}

Just as some adherents of Islam live with domestic violence, so, too, do members of conservative Christian sects. Using the second National Survey of Families and Households, University of Virginia Professor Brad Wilcox compared rates of family violence between conservative Protestant\textsuperscript{67} married men with children and mainline Protestant men and unaffiliated men.\textsuperscript{68} Wilcox found that “[n]ominal conservative Protestants husbands have a domestic violence rate of 7.2 percent and are significantly more abusive than unaffiliated husbands, active conservative Protestant husbands, and nominal mainline Protestant husbands.”\textsuperscript{69}

\begin{table}[h]
\centering
\begin{tabular}{|l|c|c|}
\hline
Would you approve of a man slapping his wife if: & % Females Yes & % Males Yes \\
\hline
She won’t do what he tells her to do & 20.4 & 5.1 \\
She insults him in public & 17.2 & 43.6 \\
She comes home drunk & 56.3 & 51.4 \\
She hits him first when they have an argument & 58.7 & 59.0 \\
\hline
\end{tabular}
\caption{Approval of Wife Slapping}
\end{table}

\textsuperscript{64} See id. (showing that 48.4\% of female and 22.5\% of male respondents approve of a man slapping his wife if he learns that she had an affair). Researchers also asked if it would be appropriate for a man to slap his wife when:

\begin{itemize}
\item She won’t do what he tells her to do
\item She insults him in public
\item She comes home drunk
\item She hits him first when they have an argument \end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{65} Id. The sample was not large enough to present parallel statistics for men on this question.

\textsuperscript{66} Muhammad M. Haj-Yahia, \textit{Beliefs About Wife Beating Among Arab Men From Israel: The Influence of Their Patriarchal Ideology}, 18 J. FAM. VIOLENCE 193, 194 (2003); id. at 199 (“[A] substantial proportion of the [male] respondents justified wife beating. Fifty-eight percent strongly agreed or agreed that ‘there is no excuse for a man to beat his wife’ . . . whereas about 28\% strongly agreed or agreed that ‘sometimes it is OK for a man to beat his wife’ . . . . Moreover, between 15 and 62\% strongly agreed or agreed that wife beating is justified on certain occasions.”); see also Muhammad M. Haj-Yahia, \textit{A Patriarchal Perspective of Beliefs About Wife Beating Among Arab Palestinian Men from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip}, 19 J. FAM. ISSUES 595, 604–05 (1998).

\textsuperscript{68} See id. at 181–82.

\textsuperscript{69} Id.; see also Wilson, supra note 5 (manuscript at 30–32) (collecting other studies of Christian groups).
Risks of violence in religious communities extend to children as well. A study of child sexual abuse by researcher Rebecca Bolen found that Protestant and Catholic children had less child sexual abuse risk than children in other families, especially when very young. But when analyzed across the years of childhood, that risk spiked in adolescence, as Figure 4 illustrates. Specifically, the risk of sexual abuse for children raised as Protestants, shown in Figure 4, spikes in late adolescence, while the risk for Catholic children spikes in the early teens. The increase in risk for observant adolescents is on par with other factors that one intuitively grasps can affect a child’s risk of sexual abuse, as when a girl lives with males in the household after her parents divorce.

Figure 4

70 See Rebecca M. Bolen, Predicting Risk to Be Sexually Abused: A Comparison of Logistic Regression to Event History Analysis, 3 CHILD MALTREATMENT 157, 164 fig.6, 167 (1998). Bolen did not capture the identity of the perpetrator of the abuse. Some of it may have been intrafamilial, some extrafamilial. See generally Robin Fretwell Wilson, The Cradle of Abuse: Evaluating the Danger Posed by a Sexually Predatory Parent to the Victim’s Siblings, 51 EMORY L.J. 241 (2002). In this discussion, child sexual abuse may spark a mother’s desire to exit the marriage if it occurs within the family.

71 See Bolen, supra note 70, at 164 fig.6.

72 Id.

74 This figure is adapted from the Bolen study. See Bolen, supra note 70.
Child physical abuse also marks religious communities. Professors Christopher Dyslin and Cynthia Thomsen have examined whether religious affiliation or religiosity are related to child physical abuse risk. They distinguished mere spanking from child physical abuse, which they defined as “entail[ing] more extreme forms of physical aggression,” such as “being hit with a fist, burned, or choked.” Dyslin and Thomsen found that while “Conservative Protestant” religious affiliation was not related to child physical abuse risk, “[i]ndividuals with high levels of extrinsic religiosity had higher [child-abuse tendencies]” than those with lower extrinsic religiosity.

Extrinsic religiosity is akin to wearing one’s religion on one’s sleeve; it places an emphasis on religion as membership in a “powerful in-group,” providing protection, consolation, and social status.

While Dyslin and Thomsen restricted their inquiry to more severe acts of abuse, such as choking and burning, other researchers have examined links between religion and simple corporal punishment. The overwhelming weight of evidence indicates that certain religious adherents resort to corporal punishment far more often than other parents.

Clearly, family violence afflicts some religious communities, as it does society generally. More disturbing for the idea of giving deference to religious groups

---

76 Id. at 292.
77 Dyslin and Thomsen classified the following denominations as Conservative Protestants: “Adventist, Assemblies of God, Baptist, Church of God in Christ, Evangelical Free, Foursquare Gospel, Full Gospel, Holiness, Missouri or Wisconsin Synod Lutheran, Nazarene, Non-denominational (Evangelical), Pentecostal, and Wesleyan.” Id. at 293 n.2.
78 Compare id. at 295–96, with Bette L. Bottoms et al., Religion-Related Child Physical Abuse: Characteristics and Psychological Outcomes, 8 J. AGGRESSION MALTREATMENT & TRAUMA 87, 90 (2003) (finding in a survey of nearly 650 members of the Christian Reformed Church that “church attendance was inversely related to reported perpetration of child abuse”).
79 Dyslin & Thomsen, supra note 75, at 296 (emphasis added).
82 See Wilson, supra note 5 (manuscript at 43–46 nn. 141–50 and accompanying text) (collecting studies and theological texts supporting corporal punishment).
83 As I and others have argued elsewhere, religious exemptions in the context of the family will sometimes serve to rob women and children of the state’s protection. See, e.g., Wilson, supra note 5 (manuscript at 10) (“In a majority of U.S. states, religious understandings of family duties currently govern in one significant context, the medical treatment of children. The state’s choice to turn a blind eye to parental refusals to treat dying children has yielded tragic results.”); see also MARCI A. HAMILTON, GOD VS. THE GAVEL: RELIGION AND THE RULE OF LAW 274 (2005) (arguing that the rule of law should apply “to religious entities as is that religious leaders often tolerate this domestic violence, as the next subpart documents.

B. Discouraging Exit From Abusive Relationships

Religious leaders across many traditions actively discourage the victims of family violence from exiting the marriage. A trio of studies of Christian groups illustrate the degree of this tolerance of domestic violence. A 2000 study of 158 Christian religious leaders found that many believed “marriage must be saved at all costs”—even when domestic violence occurs—and that a realistic solution for victims included “forgiving and forgetting the abuse.”

In a second study, eighty percent of women abused in their marriages who asked clergy for advice received only religious advice or, because it is a wife’s duty to forgive, were told to return home or to seek marriage counseling. A third study, a 1988 survey of conservative Protestant pastors, found that ninety-two percent would “never advise a woman to divorce an abuser.”

Many Jewish and Muslim religious leaders also prize the “sanctity” of the marriage over the victim’s safety. In all these settings, it is “especially difficult for it is applied to all others” and that the “governing law should not be one that any one individual decides according to his or her own perspective, but rather a set of laws created by duly enacted legislatures charged with consideration of the public good”). For an argument that religious exemptions may be consistent with the rule of law, see Kent Greenawalt, The Rule of Law and the Exemption Strategy, 30 CARDOZO L. REV. 1513 (2009).

Shannon-Lewy & Dull, supra note 84, at 651 (citing James M. Alsdurf & Pamela Alsdurf, A Pastoral Response, in ABUSE AND RELIGION: WHEN PRAYING ISN’T ENOUGH 165, 168 (Anne L. Horton & Judith A. Williamson eds., 1988)).

See Linda L. Ammons, What’s God Got to Do With It? Church and State Collaboration in the Subordination of Women and Domestic Violence, 51 RUTGERS L. REV. 1207 (1999). “Jewish women tend to stay in abusive relationships longer than non-Jews,” largely because of community pressure to maintain peace in the home or “shalom bayit.” Id. at 1269 n.377 (quoting Debra Darvick, To Have and To Harm, FORWARD FAM., Nov. 8, 1996, at 1).

In much the same way, Professor Rukhsana Ayyub explains that the Muslim community “condemns any woman who seeks legal protection from an abusive spouse.” Rukhsana Ayyub, Domestic Violence in the South Asian Muslim Immigrant Population in the United States, 9 J. SOC. DISTRESS & HOMELESS 237, 242 (2000). Professor Ayyub also notes that, among South Asian Muslims in the United States, “[v]iolence in marriage is generally condemned but when it does happen the religious community gives no clear consequences for the violent behavior.” Id. Researcher Haj-Yahia notes that an Arab woman who seeks removal of her husband from the home “may be ostracized by [her] community and blamed for undermining family stability and unity.” Muhammad M. Haj-Yahia, Wife Abuse and Battering in the Sociocultural Context of Arab Society, 39 Fam. Process 237, 238 (2000). Haj-Yahia attributes ostracism of the wife to “the prevailing belief that the children’s best interest [and her family’s reputation] take precedence over her own well-being and safety.” Id. at 239–40. As I noted in a previous article, “[p]reserving the marriage is of such great importance that physical violence is viewed as ‘preferable to divorce.’” Wilson, supra note 46, at 1376 & n.79 (quoting S. Douki et al., Violence Against Women in Arab and Islamic Countries, 6 Archives Women’s Mental Health 165, 169 (2003)).

89 Importantly, raising the costs of exit for women in cases of family violence undercuts powers that liberal states have not ceded and will not cede to religious courts, for example, the decision to prosecute domestic violence. For instance, many states have instituted “no drop” policies for domestic violence, which “mandate prosecution of abusers, even if the victims do not wish to proceed.” Aya Gruber, Rape, Feminism, and the War on Crime, 84 Wash. L. Rev. 581, 649 (2009). The objective of these policies is to take offenders out of the home and community. By removing the offender’s opportunity to convince a victim to dismiss the charges, such policies serve to empower victims, who can feel confident that domestic violence will not be tolerated by the state. J. Alex Little, Balancing Accountability and Victim Autonomy at the International Criminal Court, 38 Geo. J. Int’l L. 363, 384–85 (2007).

III. PROTECTION OF DEPENDENTS UPON DEATH

Just as women may be worse off when religious rules are applied upon divorce, so too are they likely to be in the context of inheritance.⁹⁰ The Anglo-American family stability and unity.” Muhammad M. Haj-Yahia, Wife Abuse and Battering in the Sociocultural Context of Arab Society, 39 Fam. Process 237, 238 (2000). Haj-Yahia attributes ostracism of the wife to “the prevailing belief that the children’s best interest [and her family’s reputation] take precedence over her own well-being and safety.” Id. at 239–40. As I noted in a previous article, “[p]reserving the marriage is of such great importance that physical violence is viewed as ‘preferable to divorce.’” Wilson, supra note 46, at 1376 & n.79 (quoting S. Douki et al., Violence Against Women in Arab and Islamic Countries, 6 Archives Women’s Mental Health 165, 169 (2003)).

89 Importantly, raising the costs of exit for women in cases of family violence undercuts powers that liberal states have not ceded and will not cede to religious courts, for example, the decision to prosecute domestic violence. For instance, many states have instituted “no drop” policies for domestic violence, which “mandate prosecution of abusers, even if the victims do not wish to proceed.” Aya Gruber, Rape, Feminism, and the War on Crime, 84 Wash. L. Rev. 581, 649 (2009). The objective of these policies is to take offenders out of the home and community. By removing the offender’s opportunity to convince a victim to dismiss the charges, such policies serve to empower victims, who can feel confident that domestic violence will not be tolerated by the state. J. Alex Little, Balancing Accountability and Victim Autonomy at the International Criminal Court, 38 Geo. J. Int’l L. 363, 384–85 (2007).

If a legally enforceable religious tradition hobbles a battered spouse’s ability to leave the relationship, many women likely will not report family violence, undercutting the state’s scheme for sanctioning family violence. In this way, it is possible that religious deference will either (1) make things worse for women in groups the state is trying to support, or (2) dramatically affect the state’s real-world willingness to exercise the authority it has retained for itself—for example, by increasing the unwillingness of police and prosecutors to pursue charges against a violent husband if they know that the wife will be unable to exit the marriage.

⁹⁰ Muslims in Great Britain could apply Sharia law to matters of succession even before the eighty-five Sharia Courts began to operate. Pearl & Menski, supra note 27, at 486 (“Muslims in Britain who want to ensure that Muslim law applies to an inheritance in England, rather than the English legal rules, have basically two options, either to make a will laying down that succession should take place in accordance with Muslim law . . . or to distribute their property inter vivos.”). Presumably, if a decedent does not take these steps, his son system protects the welfare of citizens through inheritance schemes that favor the surviving spouse, regardless of gender. But, as this Part documents, some religious norms preclude a widow from inheriting more than a limited fraction of the husband’s estate, pushing wives onto the state’s safety net. Specifically, under Islamic inheritance rules, surviving female spouses receive a fraction of what they would receive under Anglo-American law. By contrast under British law, the surviving spouse gets a substantial portion of the estate.

It is important to review briefly the modern changes in Anglo-American intestacy law before considering how the application of religious norms will significantly disadvantage women. In the United States, each state has developed its own law governing the division of property upon a spouse’s death. Property may be willed by or other family member could enlist the Sharia court to apply Islamic law upon his death. Cf. MARION BOYD, CANADIAN MINISTRY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, DISPUTE RESOLUTION IN FAMILY LAW: PROTECTING CHOICE, PROMOTING INCLUSION (2004) (discussing arbitration of inheritance cases before Canada prohibited religious arbitration using religious rules).

A relatively recent twentieth-century phenomenon, the spouse’s elevation to the role of primary heir is one of the most significant changes in the American law of inheritance. Historically, spouses provided for one another through the marital estates of dower and curtesy rather than through inheritance. Through a dower, the woman would be entitled to a life estate in one-third of her deceased husband’s land (or, more precisely, of the land of which he was seized of an estate of inheritance during the marriage), with title to the real estate going to the children, not to the surviving spouse. See RALPH C. BRASHIER, INHERITANCE LAW AND THE EVOLVING FAMILY 13–14 (2004); WILLIAM M. MCGOVERN, JR. & SHELDON F. KURTZ, WILLS, TRUSTS AND ESTATES 42–43 (2d. ed. 2001). A widow could receive one-third to one-half of her spouse’s personal property, depending on whether the decedent had children. A widower, on the other hand, received rights to his wife’s personal property upon marriage rather than death. MCGOVERN & KURTZ, supra, at 43. This distribution scheme reflected society notions that “[u]nderlying a woman’s status was a concept of a woman as a man’s ‘property’—a concept applicable not only to the married woman, but also to the single woman, as well, who was subject to her father’s control preceding her marriage.” 2 WOMEN AND THE LAW: THE SOCIAL HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE 1 (D. Kelly Weisberg ed., 1982). In this distribution scheme, a wife’s inheritance was limited to a life estate for fear that “if the surviving spouse inherited land in fee it would be permanently removed from the decedent’s family, particularly if the couple had no children or if the surviving spouse remarried or had children by another marriage.” MCGOVERN & KURTZ, supra, at 42–43.

By contrast, the modern model generally confers an “outright (fee simple) share of the deceased’s property . . . [and] distinctions between widows and widowers have disappeared, and would be of doubtful constitutionality today.” Id. at 43.

Mary F. Radford, The Inheritance Rights of Women Under Jewish and Islamic Law, 23 B.C. INT’L & COMP. L. REV. 135, 184 (2000) (“Western cultures . . . have come close in modern times to achieving sex equality in [intestacy] law while, at the same time, a resurgence of fundamentalism in . . . Islam . . . threatens to visit new and even greater inequities on women.”). The illustrations in this Part also make this point.

See infra note 113 and accompanying chart.

See Portuán Miller, supra note 19, at 116–17. The underlying rationale for intestacy statutes is widely disputed. Some maintain that the statutes attempt to provide default rules the decedent, but if the decedent does not act, his or her property will be distributed according to the state’s intestacy laws. As a general rule, spouses in community property states—that is, states that consider property acquired during the marriage to be owned by both spouses—may devise in a will only one-half of the community property, with the other half belonging to the surviving spouse. One spouse may will to the other his or her half of the community property, as well as any other property acquired outside of the marriage; but, he or she generally may also elect to omit the spouse completely.

In non-community property states, each spouse may devise his or her property in its entirety to whomever he or she wishes. However, with the exception of one state, that effect the devises most decedents would have wanted to make. Others argue that the shift served societal welfare, including the protection of financially dependent family members. See Radford, supra note 92, at 136 (discussing the history of inheritance laws in Western society and concluding that the modern Anglo-American trend affords a widow the right to be supported after the death of her husband); see also Adam J. Hirsch, Default Rules in Inheritance Law: A Problem in Search of Its Context, 73 FORDHAM L. REV. 1031, 1033–37 (2004) (explaining the underlying reasoning behind state intestacy statute trends and concluding that “every conceivable preference—that of the decedent, that of survivors, that of society—all mixed together” factors into modern intestacy laws).

This debate over the driving force behind modern Anglo-American intestacy statutes may be an academic exercise here since both rationales will yield the same results in many instances. For example, since the Statute of Wills, property owners who fail to exercise the right of testamentary control relinquish to the state the right to distribute the property in a way that best serves the purpose of social and economic stability; in the case of spouses, this frequently will result in distributing the property to the deceased’s immediate family members, who then can remain independent without need of public support. See Mary Louise Fellows et al., Public Attitudes About Property Distribution at Death and Intestate Succession Laws in the United States, 1978 AM. B. FOUND. RES. J. 319, 324 (finding that two of the four major societal aims in estate distribution are “to protect the financially dependent family” and “to promote and encourage the nuclear family”). By the same token, presumably most spouses would intend to provide for the care of their husband or wife upon their death had they acted. See McGovern & Kurtz, supra note 91, at 43 (“Empirical data suggests that most people want a larger share to pass to the spouse than the former rules provided.”).

95 See Leslie Joan Harris et al., Family Law 47–49 (3d ed. 2005).
96 See Portuán Miller, supra note 19, at 118 n.337 (citing McMurry v. Stanley, 6 S.W. 412, 415 (Tex. 1887), as a case that exemplifies community property rules governing the division of property).
97 While a decedent in a community property state may disinherit his or her spouse, the surviving spouse will still retain ownership over her half of the community property. McGovern & Kurtz, supra note 91, at 149. Thus, in instances of brief marriages in which the couple accrues minimal community assets, it may be possible for one spouse virtually to disinherit the other spouse. The harshness of this rule is muted in most community property states by statutory minimums to which the surviving spouse is entitled, even if there is no community property. Id. (“[S]ome have criticized the community property system for failing to give a needy surviving spouse any rights in the decedent’s separate property. The Uniform Probate Code attempts to meet this objection by including in the elective share an additional amount to reflect the ‘spouses’ mutual duties of support.’” (internal citations omitted)).
if the decedent does not provide a certain amount for the surviving spouse, he or she can petition to take a forced elective share, which is generally one-half to one-third of the estate.98

In the absence of a will, Anglo-American intestate law provides significant, concrete protection for dependent spouses. In most states today in the U.S., a surviving spouse of any gender takes the entire intestate estate unless there are surviving children of the deceased who have a different parent other than the survivor.99 British law also allows a surviving spouse to challenge a testamentary distribution in favor of an intestate one.100

Unlike the Anglo-American system, which provides a generous safety net for the surviving spouse, Islamic law gives widows a slim fraction of the entire estate. Because the Qur’an limits any person from devising more than one-third of his estate,101 the intestacy distribution scheme affects every estate under Islamic law. Just as critical, Sunni law, which governs ninety percent of the world’s Muslims, forbids any named heir, including wives, from taking under a will,102 leaving only intestate distribution

---

98 See Portuán Miller, supra note 19, at 118 n.340 (citing Jesse Dukeminier & James E. Krier, Property 395 (4th ed. 1998)). Elective statutory shares are available in every state except Georgia. See id. at 118. In Georgia, a disinherited spouse, or one that receives very little from the deceased, is not entitled to an elective share. Id.

The elective share is generally a fraction of the probate estate or, in Uniform Probate Code (UPC) jurisdictions—Alaska, Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Hawaii, Idaho, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Carolina, South Dakota, and Utah—the augmented estate. See Unif. Probate Code, § 2-202(a) (1993). Because elective shares in non-UPC states can vary and because the distribution of every estate involves its own unique circumstances, it ultimately may be possible to disinherit a spouse despite these legislative safeguards. See Brashier, supra note 91, at 14–18 (illustrating the disparate outcomes that can result from a spouse invoking the elective share).

99 Unif. Probate Code § 2-102(1)(ii) (1993); cf. infra note 113 (discussing British intestacy laws). As this discussion shows, in the United States, surviving spouses with children in common with the decedent are potentially much better off under most American intestacy statutes than they are under the law of the United Kingdom. For example, in a situation where a spouse dies with $10 million worth of real property and children by the surviving spouse only, in the United States, the surviving spouse gets it all. In the United Kingdom, the surviving spouse gets only about $400,000 (£250,000) and a life estate in $4.8 million worth of real estate. While this is a lot, it is not as much as under U.S. law. On the other hand, under U.K. law, the rest goes to the surviving spouse’s children, which is where it would likely end up anyway after his or her death.

100 See Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act, 1975, c. 63, § 1 (Eng.).

101 Pearl & Menski, supra note 27, at 449 (“There are two restrictions on the power to make bequests. The two rules dealing with ultra vires bequests in Sunni law are that no bequests can be made which involve disposition beyond one third of the net estate (unless the heirs agree) and that no bequest can be made in favour of an heir.”).

102 See id.; see also Radford, supra note 92, at 168 (“Under Islamic law, an individual is allowed to bequeath up to one-third of his estate. The Sunni system prohibits this one-third for wives. The Qur’an provides that the wife may never inherit more than one-fourth of the estate.\footnote{Surat An-Nisā’ 4:12, available at http://quran.com/4 (“And for the wives is one fourth if you [the husband] leave no child. But if you leave a child, then for them is an eighth of what you leave, after any bequest you [may have] made or debt.”).} Her small share is slashed in half to one-eighth of the estate if her deceased husband leaves any children, whether in common with the surviving spouse or not.\footnote{See id.} In the event of multiple wives, the wife’s share is split evenly among the wives, instead of each receiving her own share as a wife.\footnote{See NASIR, supra note 20, at 208.} Although women may also inherit from their fathers or male relatives, their inheritance is limited by complex rules governing their fractional share.\footnote{PEARL & MENSKI, supra note 27, at 457 (describing the outcomes of various scenarios).} So, for example, in inheriting from a parent, a woman may receive only half the amount received by her brother.\footnote{Surat An-Nisā’, supra note 103, at 4:11 (“Allah instructs you concerning your children: for the male, what is equal to the share of two females.”).}

A series of concrete hypotheticals best illustrate the disparity in the widow’s intestate share that results from applying Islamic rather than civil law.\footnote{The outcomes of each hypothetical were checked against the Islamic Inheritance Program. See IRTH: The Islamic Inheritance Program, http://www.islamicsoftware.org/irth/irth.html (last visited Apr. 20, 2010). The hypotheticals are set in Great Britain because a system of religious deference now operates there.} Assume first that a Sunni man dies in Great Britain, leaving an estate of £100,000 ($159,812.76).\footnote{All conversions from British pounds to U.S. dollars were performed on the Universal Currency Calculator, available at http://www.xe.com/ucc/ (last visited Apr. 20, 2010).} from being bequeathed to any family member who is named in the Qur’anic framework.” (internal citations omitted)).

It is possible that any given woman could net more financially under Islamic rules if the size of her mandatory inheritance from her father, brother, son or other natal relatives—when combined with the paltry sum she receives from her deceased husband—exceeds what she would receive upon her husband’s death and the death of other relatives under civil law.\footnote{PEARL & MENSKI, supra note 27, at 456–63 (discussing a woman’s inheritance from her father).} But because we cannot know and predict when these different deaths may occur, and what the size of each decedent’s estate will be, the possibility of natal inheritance does not erase risk of grave financial need upon the death of her husband.

This Essay focuses on intestate succession because it provides for dependents when the decedent did not make a provision himself.\footnote{See JANET FINCH ET AL., WILLS, INHERITANCE, AND FAMILIES, 24–26 (1996) (“[T]he key restrictions on testamentary freedom introduced during the twentieth century have been intended specifically to protect the close family of the testator from the possibility of exclusion from the will. . . . [The Inheritance (Family Provision) Act 1938 and the Inheritance (Provision for Family and Dependants) Act 1975] have served to emphasise that inheritance is not only about passing property down the generations. It is also—importantly—now about marriage and the financial responsibilities of spouses for each other.”).} Obviously, a testator could undercut the degree of financial support for a widow by making a will that is less generous than what she would receive in the absence of a will, cabin’d of course by any right the widow has to receive an elective share.\footnote{Obviously, a testator could undercut the degree of financial support for a widow by making a will that is less generous than what she would receive in the absence of a will, cabin’d of course by any right the widow has to receive an elective share. See supra notes 89–90 (discussing wills), 97 (discussing elective shares) and accompanying text.}
He is survived by his wife, mother, and father. Applying Islamic intestacy law, the father receives £50,000 ($79,906.38), the mother receives £25,000 ($39,966.14), and the wife is left with only £25,000 ($39,966.14). Under Islamic law, the decedent could not have forestalled this paltry award to his widow because he cannot make a devise by will to a named heir. In sharp contrast, British intestacy law would award the surviving wife the entire estate, or £100,000 ($159,832.30).

Even skimpier awards result in polygamous marriages, when a man leaves multiple widows. Consider the result in the first hypothetical if the man had taken four wives, which is permissible under the Qur’an. Under Islamic intestacy law, the father receives £50,000 ($79,906.38), the mother receives £25,000 ($39,966.14), and the wives end up with £6,250 ($9,990.39) apiece. Under British law, the mother and father receive nothing and the wives together would receive £100,000 ($159,812.76), with each wife presumably taking £25,000 ($39,966.14).

110 See Surat An-Nisā’, supra note 103, at 4:11; Pearl & Menski, supra note 27, at 457 (discussing the father as the agnatic heir). The outcomes of each hypothetical were checked against the Islamic Inheritance Program. See IRTH: The Islamic Inheritance Program, supra note 108.

111 See Surat An-Nisā’, supra note 103, at 4:11; Pearl & Menski, supra note 27, at 457.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Size of the Estate</th>
<th>Survivors</th>
<th>Distribution to spouse</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>&lt; £250,000</td>
<td>Spouse</td>
<td>All to spouse</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥ £250,000</td>
<td>Spouse and children</td>
<td>£250,000 to spouse, personal chattels absolutely, life interest in ½ of the remaining estate</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&lt; £450,000</td>
<td>Spouse and no children</td>
<td>All to spouse</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>≥ £450,000</td>
<td>Spouse and decedent’s parents and/or brothers and sisters</td>
<td>£450,000 to spouse, personal chattels absolutely, absolute interest in ½ of the remaining estate</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Of whatever value</td>
<td>Spouse and no children, parents, brothers or sisters</td>
<td>All to spouse</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

114 See Surat An-Nisā’, supra note 103, at 4:3 (“[M]arry those that please you of [other] women, two or three or four.”).

115 See id. at 4:11.

116 See id.

117 See id. at 4:12; IRTH: The Islamic Inheritance Program, supra note 108.

118 See The Family Provision (Intestate Succession) Order, supra note 113. Although Anglo-American public policy generally opposes polygamy, some jurisdictions have been willing to overlook public policy if no harm would result in doing so. Thus, for example, a California Court of Appeals found that public policy would not be offended by allowing the surviving two wives of a decedent in a polygamous marriage to split the intestate share. Kaur v. Boyes,
A woman’s fractional award shrinks further if the decedent has children. Consider the results of a £100,000 estate distributed among a surviving wife, mother, father, daughter, and two sons. Islamic law would award the father £16,600 ($26,534.48), the mother £16,600 ($26,534.48), the daughter £10,800 ($17,269.10), each son £21,600 ($34,538.19), leaving the wife only £12,500 ($19,980.03). If British intestacy law applies, the wife would receive the entire £100,000 ($159,832.30) estate. If the decedent leaves four wives rather than one, under Islamic law each 188 P.2d 499, 502 (Cal. Dist. Ct. App. 1948) (“‘Public policy’ would not be affected by dividing the money equally between the two wives, particularly since there is no contest between them and they are the only interested parties.”). Neither of the man’s wives contested the right of the other to share the inheritance, and the law of India, where the marriages were performed, also would have distributed the spousal share evenly between them. Id. at 499; see also C.H. SHERRIN & R.C. BONEHILL, THE LAW AND PRACTICE OF INTESTATE SUCCESSION 335 (2d ed. 1994) (“There is in fact no direct authority but it is submitted with some confidence that a party to a polygamous marriage would be entitled as a husband or wife on the intestacy of the other.” (internal citation omitted)).

A number of commentators have examined the public policy implications of recognizing polygamous marriages as valid. See generally Ann Laquer Estin, Unofficial Family Law, 94 IOWA L. REV. 449 (2009) (discussing recognition at the time of the divorce). While courts have recognized multiple spouses in the context of divorce, it is possible that a court may treat a polygamous marriage as valid for purposes of qualifying for a social welfare program but not for inheritance purposes (thus limiting inheritance rights only to the first spouse). However, I know of no jurisdiction that does this.

Kaur v. Boyes notwithstanding, it is possible that many American jurisdictions would take the position that in cases of polygamous marriage, the first marriage will be treated as the only valid one, entitling the first spouse to exclusive spousal inheritance rights, whatever they may be. In this instance, the application of Islamic law would still remove from the first wife significant protections accorded to her by civil law. In the United States, she may receive the entire intestate estate if her husband had children only with her, and in the United Kingdom, under certain dollar thresholds, she would also receive the entire estate. See supra note 113 and accompanying text. As this Part explains, her share shrinks dramatically if Islamic law is applied. But if the civil law refused to recognize polygamous marriages, the second, third, and fourth wives would actually do better if Islamic law was applied. They then would go from receiving nothing under Anglo-American civil law to receiving, in the case of four wives, one-sixteenth apiece. See supra note 105 and accompanying text. In families of modest means, and even many middle-class families, the one-sixteenth fractional share that each wife receives may not suffice to raise her above the poverty level. Of course, nothing prevents the first wife, if she receives the entire estate under civil law, from choosing unilaterally to split the estate with the other wives.

119 See Surat An-Nisā’, supra note 103, at 4:11 (“And for one’s parents, to each one of them is a sixth of his estate if he left children.”).
120 See id.
121 See id. (“Allah instructs you concerning your children: for the male, what is equal to the share of two females.”).
122 See id.
123 See id.
124 See The Family Provision (Intestate Succession) Order, supra note 113.
would only inherit a mere £3,000 ($4,795.43) of the estate.\textsuperscript{125} By contrast, under British law each wife would receive £25,000 ($39,966.14).\textsuperscript{126}

One final hypothetical drives home the degree to which deference to Islamic law deliberately and needlessly jeopardizes a widow’s financial security. Assume upon a decedent’s death that he leaves a £100,000 estate and is survived by only his wife and a freed slave. If a court chose to apply Islamic intestacy law, the wife would receive £25,000 ($39,966.14) and the freed slave would pocket the remaining £75,000 ($119,893.62).\textsuperscript{127} A court applying British law would award the entire estate to the widow.\textsuperscript{128}

In short, there are far more protections for dependents provided under British law than under Islamic law. And, ultimately under British law, the testator may always devise the entirety of his estate—something that Qur’anic law precludes.

IV. DOES THE STATE HAVE AN INTEREST HERE?

Some argue that “family law pluralism” allows religious adherents “to opt out of a jurisdiction’s generally applicable norms and to pre-commit to” their own ethical conceptions of the good.\textsuperscript{129} Implicit in this idea is the notion that the State should not impose protections on those who do not wish to be protected. Of course, the State often protects individuals from themselves and exercises especially vigorous oversight when the relationship is an intimate one.\textsuperscript{130}

This Part considers first whether cultural norms of support will suffice to assuage concern that women will be impoverished upon divorce if Muslim rules govern the break-up. It then asks whether respect for women’s autonomy to choose the application of Islamic law upon divorce or a spouse’s death can justify removing the protections afforded by state law.

A. Financial Support for Dependents

In theory, the state should be neutral as to the source of support for vulnerable dependents so long as some system of support exists for women and children. Western ideas of the family generally require spouses to shoulder a duty of support \textsuperscript{125} See Surat An-Nisā’, supra note 103, at 4:12.

\textsuperscript{126} See The Family Provision (Intestate Succession) Order, supra note 113; see also supra note 105 and accompanying text (discussing recognition of multiple wives).
\textsuperscript{127} This hypothetical is adapted from The Islamic Inheritance Program, supra note 108.
\textsuperscript{128} See The Family Provision (Intestate Succession) Order, supra note 113.
\textsuperscript{129} See Fadel, supra note 18, at 63.
\textsuperscript{130} See Brian H. Bix, The ALI Principles and Agreements: Seeking a Balance between Status and Contract, in RECONCEIVING THE FAMILY: CRITIQUE ON THE AMERICAN LAW INSTITUTE’S PRINCIPLES OF THE LAW OF FAMILY DISSOLUTION 372, 373–74 (Robin Fretwell Wilson ed., 2006) (noting that most U.S. states employ “a more paternalistic and substantive test for enforceability” of premarital agreements than would be used for a “commercial agreement”).
with respect to each other and obligate parents to support their children.131 While “there is a lack of agreement on just what purpose alimony serves” after divorce, for some judges “alimony continues the support which the wife was entitled to receive while the marriage existed.”132

Islam shares with this Western tradition the obligation to provide for one’s wife during an intact marriage and to provide for children without respect to whether the parents remain married.133 Some Islamic schools, however, depart from Western notions regarding what happens upon divorce. In a number of schools, a divorcing husband’s obligation to maintain his former wife ends at the end of the iddat period, mere months after the break-up.134 The duty of support for a divorced woman then falls to her natal family upon divorce, not her husband.135

In Great Britain, at least, some Muslims rationally have processed the welfare state’s “readiness to foot the bill” for dependents and have begun to look to that system for a sister or daughter’s support.136 As Pearl and Menski note, despite the family’s duty of support, cultural norms have “probably been modified by the impact of the welfare state.”137 This shifting of the support obligation to the state means that the state necessarily has an interest in whether husbands make support payments for needy dependents after divorce, as well as in the size of a widow’s inheritance upon her husband’s death.

B. Respect for Autonomy

A second argument is frequently advanced to justify a greater role for religious norms, namely respect for a woman’s autonomy to decide whether religious law will

131 See generally JUNE CARBONE, FROM PARTNERS TO PARENTS: THE SECOND REVOLUTION IN FAMILY LAW (2000) (describing a paradigm shift in the legal and social regulation of the family from an emphasis on partners’ relationships with each other to an emphasis on parents’ relationships with their children); HOMER H. CLARK, JR., THE LAW OF DOMESTIC RELATIONS IN THE UNITED STATES 620–21, 252–59 (Student ed., 2d ed. 1988) (describing the scope of duties between spouses to support each other and their children).

132 CLARK, supra note 131, at 621.

133 Thus, for example, fathers after divorce would provide support to their children as a function of having custody of them. See supra Figure 1. Husbands also have a duty to provide for their wives’ support during the marriage. See generally UHLMAN, supra note 18, § 5.4.

134 See supra note 27 and accompanying text.

135 PEARL & MENSKI, supra note 27, at 235 (noting that “during the waiting period, the wife is entitled to have full maintenance from the husband or members of his family,” but that after the iddat period, the traditional view, in the absence of a welfare state, holds that “the wife’s natal family has a role to play in maintaining the divorced wife or the widow”) (quoting Manazir Ahsan, The Muslim Family in Britain, in GOD’S LAW VERSUS STATE LAW: THE CONSTRUCTION OF AN ISLAMIC IDENTITY IN WESTERN EUROPE 21, 25 (Michael King ed., 1995)).

136 Id.

137 Id.
govern. As Part I illustrates, women face significant inequities in systems of deference. Despite these inequities, some scholars maintain that respect for women’s autonomy can justify a system of deference. Others note that prenuptial agreements have long permitted spouses to privately order their affairs.

Even jurisdictions most inclined to respect a couple’s autonomy to privately order their marital affairs will strike an agreement that is coerced or involuntary. In schemes of religious deference, there is every reason to worry that a woman’s “choice” to have religious authorities decide family matters is not a truly voluntary, independent one. Muslim women may feel compelled to participate in Sharia courts because of their religious and cultural upbringing. “[G]ender norms that prescribe passivity and compliance make it difficult for women to enact resistance.”

Moreover, all the ordinary concerns that courts have over the ability of prospective spouses to bargain at arm’s length and appreciate the consequences are exacerbated when a religious body acts as the arbitrator. Religious groups can exert considerable influence on their members. The systems of deference described in Part I provide no evidence that women can, or have, resisted such powerful influences.

Publicly available documents from Great Britain’s Islamic Sharia Council do not explain how the Council ensures that the decision to religiously arbitrate is voluntary and not coerced. Canada, which recently scrapped religious arbitration, recommended forty-six safeguards and reforms to protect vulnerable parties. These included public education “aimed at creating awareness of the legal system, alternative dispute resolution options, and family law provisions;” screening parties “separately about issues of power imbalance and domestic violence, prior to entering into an arbitration agreement;” and protections like those used with prenuptial agreements.

---

138 Some scholars have argued that autonomy affords the less powerful an opportunity to “transform” their communities from within, giving those traditionally vulnerable groups greater power in the long run. See, e.g., Ayelet Shachar, The Puzzle of Interlocking Power Hierarchies: Sharing the Pieces of Jurisdictional Authority, 35 HARV. C.R.-C.L. L. REV. 385 (2000). Other scholars suggest that granting greater autonomy to cultural groups places the less powerful in those groups, often women and children, at a further disadvantage. See, e.g., Natasha Bakht, Family Arbitration Using Sharia Law: Examining Ontario’s Arbitration Act and Its Impact on Women, 1 MUSLIM WORLD J. HUM. RTS. 1, 18 (2004) (arguing that, under Ontario’s Arbitration Act, a “regressive interpretation of Sharia will be used to seriously undermine the rights of women”).

139 See, e.g., Crane, supra note 5, at 1250–51 (discussing a proposal to limit the state’s role to enforcing contracts between private parties); Zelinsky, supra note 5, at 1219.

140 See Bix, supra note 130, at 374.

142 See supra Part II.

143 See BOYD, supra note 90, at 133–42.

144 Id. at 138.

145 Id. at 136.

146 See id. at 135.
Further, even when parties voluntarily agree to a prenuptial, the State polices the content of the agreement, asking whether it is so odious as to be unconscionable and something that no reasonable person would accept. In twenty-six U.S. jurisdictions, an agreement’s fairness is evaluated “relative to the time the agreement was signed,” but in other states fairness is evaluated “relative to the time of enforcement.” Given the staggering financial and custodial consequences of divorce for women in some religious traditions, one wonders whether any court would enforce a prenuptial agreement with terms like those routinely imposed in systems of deference today.

In addition to substantive review, ordinary prenuptial agreements are subjected to exacting review for procedural fairness. Courts often require voluntariness, complete disclosure, representation by separate counsel, and other procedural protections before the agreement may be enforced against the parties. One crucial safeguard to ensure that the parties have knowingly bound themselves to a specific, shared understanding in advance is that the agreement be in writing. Fadel urges that religious deference allows believers to pre-commit to certain conceptions of the good. Yet, as Part I details, Muslim understandings of family relationships are not a monolithic whole and can differ in nuanced but material ways from place to place and group to group. Because the ethical conceptions of the good are not always committed to writing in advance, questions immediately arise about the congruence between the parties’ understandings ex ante and the rules applied ex post by arbitrators. Questions also arise about whether like cases will be treated alike.

Family violence only exacerbates the risks to vulnerable parties. Given the routine acceptance of family violence by some religious communities, it seems unlikely that these communities will relax the application of harsh financial understandings in cases of violence—as courts routinely do when there is a material change in circumstances after a prenuptial agreement’s execution. Nor is it clear that women will be allowed to exit abusive relationships at all, as Ameena’s case illustrates.

Ayelet Shachar observes that violations of individual rights “in the identity group context” are sometimes justified by a supposed “right of exit” from the group rationale. As she notes, “the right of exit rationale forces an insider into a cruel choice... of penalties: either accept all group practices—including those that violate your fundamental citizenship rights—or (somehow) leave.”\textsuperscript{156} Shachar states that “this ‘solution’ never considers that obstacles such as economic hardship, lack of education, skills deficiencies, or emotional distress may make exit all but impossible for some.”\textsuperscript{157} Just as women cannot easily exit the community as a means to protect their interests, they cannot easily resist the “choice” to arbitrate. More fundamentally, the state should not subject these women to such impossible choices.

\textbf{C. Evaluating Possible Regulatory Responses}

These welfare concerns powerfully indict the whole enterprise of applying religious norms to family matters. Perhaps most problematic is the ceding of jurisdiction to religious bodies over family questions because the risks to vulnerable women and children are so great. Western Thrace demonstrates not only that religious norms will significantly disadvantage women, but that there will be few checks on decisions at the back end.\textsuperscript{158}

The harder question here is whether to allow religious arbitration if a woman wants her pastor or imam or priest to arbitrate family matters using religious norms. Two overarching concerns require a regulatory response: first, the possibility of “forced,” not truly voluntary participation, and second the possibility of harsh or unconscionable outcomes. As with any enterprise, the state can address these concerns \textit{ex ante} or \textit{ex post}. If the state regulates \textit{ex ante}, it could police the circumstances under which arbitration may occur or police entry into arbitration. It might, for example, follow the Canadian model and permit arbitration by religious figures using only civil law.\textsuperscript{159} That regulatory approach mutes the concern about unconscionable outcomes for women but does not remove it entirely. The significant tolerance for violence in the family by fundamentalist religious believers means that the state would nonetheless have to police the substantive judgments arrived at in those proceedings to prevent overreaching. On the entry side, the state might also require proof that a woman voluntarily elects to participate in arbitration. This safeguard seems grossly inadequate in the face of cultural and religious norms that define good believers as ones who accept such unconscionable outcomes.\textsuperscript{160} Presumably, very few religious leaders and adherents would embrace religious arbitration on these terms.

\textsuperscript{156} Id.
\textsuperscript{157} Id. (citation omitted).
\textsuperscript{158} See supra Part I.B.
\textsuperscript{159} Wilson, supra note 5 (manuscript at 50–51) (discussing Canada’s ban on religious arbitration using religious rules).
\textsuperscript{160} In Canada, for example, one Muslim leader said that foregoing religious arbitration would make one a “bad Muslim”:
The state can also address the possibility of harm from religious arbitration ex post. In this scheme, for example, it could police the substantive judgments reached in arbitration with robust public policy limitations that place out of bounds certain substantive outcomes. 161 This approach imposes on parties who are likely to be harmed, women, a duty to trigger this substantive review. Yet the same people that the state would require to trigger this review—divorced women—may not understand that they have been disadvantaged by the application of religious norms. Neither may they understand or be empowered to resist those norms given the importance of religious identity to them in their lives. This approach also would require a series of judgments by the state about when women can be made too poor as a result of divorce or be too trapped in an abusive marriage or be too threatened by the possibility of losing access

As Canadian Muslims, you have a clear choice. Do you want to govern yourself by the personal law of your own religion, or do you prefer governance by secular Canadian family law? If you choose the latter, then you cannot claim that you believe in Islam as a religion and a complete code of life actualized by a Prophet who you believe to be a mercy to all.

161 Compare Edward Brunet et al., Arbitration Law in America: A Critical Assessment 25 (2006) (“[T]he lengthy history of the public policy exception represents a perception that society would oppose an arbitration system in which courts would enforce awards blatantly inconsistent with public policy. . . . [While] the public policy exception is not explicitly within the text of the [U.S. Federal Arbitration Act, it] does exist in case law as part of American arbitration doctrine.”), with Thomas E. Carbonneau, The Law and Practice of Arbitration 396 (3d ed. 2009) (discussing the availability of judicial relief from unjust arbitral awards and concluding that such relief is only available in cases involving procedural deficiencies, including “manifest disregard of the law, irrationality, and violations of public policy”).

Even if a court possesses the right to review, it may be loath to set aside an arbitral award. Here, the 2006 case of a Hmong couple who voluntarily arbitrated their divorce with Hmong elders is illustrative. The Hmong are an ethnic group from Laos. See Jane Hamilton-Merritt, Tragic Mountains: The Hmong, the Americans, and the Secret Wars for Laos, 1942–1992, at 4–5 (1993). When the couple, Maixee and Phia Vue, began divorce proceedings, they agreed to have their dissolution disputes settled by a panel of seven Hmong elders in accordance with Hmong beliefs. Vue v. Vue, No. A05-728, 2006 WL 279070, at *1 (Minn. Ct. App. Feb. 7, 2006). In order to do this, they signed an arbitration agreement, which provided for review by the divorce court in certain circumstances, such as when the arbitrators exceed their power, or are clearly partial, or when the arbitration award is obtained by fraud. Id.; Minn. Stat. § 572.19 (2000). The parties had independent counsel when they requested arbitration before the Hmong panel. Arbitration proceeded over the next year, with seven meetings of the panel. Vue, supra, at *1–*2. After settlement, Maixee Vue moved to vacate the award, claiming, among other things, that allowing the Hmong panel to arbitrate was against public policy and resulted in an inequitable settlement. Id. at *2. The court could “discern no public policy that prohibits the parties from agreeing to have their legal issues decided by an arbitration panel according to Hmong culture and tradition” and refused to set aside the judgment. Id. at *3.
to their children. Obviously some of these judgments have already been made in the context of prenuptial agreements—for instance, that decisions regarding children cannot be removed from state oversight—but a robust theory of substantive floors, below which the state will not allow religious arbitration to go, means that questions of financial and physical vulnerability would have to be addressed as well.162

CONCLUSION

States should weigh carefully the risks to women and children before ceding jurisdiction over family matters to bodies that may be unwilling or unable to vindicate their rights. The movement to introduce religious fundamentalism into the family will have dire consequences for traditionally dependent groups, women and children, who are deserving of the state’s protection.

The state plays an important role in protecting traditionally vulnerable groups, who are themselves minorities within minorities.163 Binding women who want to exit a marriage to a religious community’s norms—whether by enforcing religious arbitrations or ceding jurisdiction over family disputes to religious authorities—will erect a barrier to exit for many women and prevent them from privately regulating conduct toward themselves and their children.

Governments should be equally wary of authorizing inequitable results upon a husband’s death. Some religious schools cap a woman’s inheritance, both by will and by intestacy, at a fraction of the decedent’s estate, plunging these women into certain poverty upon their husbands’ death. At the same time, norms in some religious communities have morphed so that family members who once would have provided support to women in need now shift this responsibility to the state.

The foreseeable inequities to women and children in systems of religious deference cannot be justified on grounds that a woman voluntarily chooses to participate or that others will step up and provide support. Existing systems of religious deference strip women and children of safeguards, evolved over decades, to protect them in times of crisis from abject poverty and disruption of the parent-child relationship. Policymakers should proceed cautiously before handing over authority for family matters to religious bodies that will rob women and children of these protections.

162 In such a system, it would be useful to collect arbitral judgments so that the state can monitor outcomes across cases as well as on a case-by-case basis. This would surface inequities against women but might also incentivize incremental improvement in the substantive outcomes for women in Sharia courts. In other words, if the Sharia courts know they are operating in the shadow of a state generally suspicious of certain Islamic precepts and outcomes, it may lead to gradual liberalization of their laws.

163 Shachar, supra note 138, at 386 (“Well-meaning accommodation policies by the state . . . may unwittingly allow systematic maltreatment of individuals within the accommodated minority group—an impact, in certain cases, so severe that it nullifies these individuals’ rights as citizens.” (internal citations omitted)).